PREFACE

TO

THE FOURTH EDITION.

IN preparing this, and the third Edition for the press, the Editor has interfered as little as possible with the original scheme of the Author, as the Work is already well known, and many persons who have become used to it might dislike any change of arrangement. In carrying out this plan, he had proposed to distinguish, in some way, the alterations in, and additions to, those Editions. But the vast number of Statutes which have been passed, and cases which have been decided both at Law and in Equity, since the second Edition was published,—and there is scarcely a day passes without some two or three cases affecting Railways being brought before the Courts,—rendered so many and such important alterations and additions absolutely necessary, that this was found impracticable. The Editor has, therefore, contented himself with endeavouring to weave them into the original text so far as he was able. But in doing so, he has found himself obliged to almost re-write a great part of the work. Several chapters are in fact entirely re-written, and others added by the Editor, whose task has been by no means an easy one; no pains having been spared to make the Work complete. And the Editor trusts that, considering the really arduous nature of the undertaking, (which has given him far more trouble than was originally calculated upon,) the profession and the public will view with indulgence any shortcomings which they may detect in the following pages.

There are several matters in the course of the legislation of the past year with regard to Railways, which appear to the Editor to require notice.

In the first place, the oft-discussed question of imposing a general limitation on the liability of Railway Companies, in respect of damages to passengers killed or injured by accidents, was not brought before the Legislature last year. But in many of the Private Acts for making railways having a terminus in London, which contain clauses compelling the Companies to run cheap trains for the Labouring Classes, there is introduced a clause limiting the liability of the Companies in respect of damages to such passengers, to an amount not exceeding 100*l.*, to be settled by an arbitrator, to be appointed by the Board of Trade (a). This looks like the “small end of the wedge;” and appears to be a concession of the principle of limiting the liability of Railway Companies in certain cases, after which, it will be more difficult for the Legislature to refuse to limit their liability in all cases to a certain definite sum. Such a limitation has been already imposed with regard to carriers of passengers by water, by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (b); with regard to certain animals, by the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, post, p. 505; and with regard to parcels containing articles of great value in small compass, by the Carriers’ Act of 1830, post, p. 511.

(b) 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 502; see now 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 54.

Another matter which appears to require notice, is this : The Court of Queen's Bench having decided upon the construction of the "Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845," that, where possession of land or houses was not required by a railway company, a tenant from year to year, whose property was merely "injuriously affected" by the works of the company, could not recover any compensation to which he might be entitled before a magistrate, as he could if possession was required, the Metropolitan Railway Company, in 1863, procured the insertion in their Act of that year of a clause (c) giving jurisdiction to magistrates in such cases. And, in 1864, several other Railway Companies connected with the Metropolis did the same thing (d). The consequence is, that a vast deal of the time of the Metropolitan Police Magistrates is taken up with Compensation Cases, and the ordinary business of the Police Courts is postponed or delayed in consequence. Now a Police Court is essentially a criminal Court, and a Police Magistrate has no means of obtaining the assistance of a jury. It would seem, therefore, worthy of consideration whether too much civil business is not thus thrown into Police Courts, and whether the County Courts, with the occasional assistance of a jury, would not be a more satisfactory tribunal for the decision of such cases. In the City of London in some cases the Lord Mayor's Court, which appears a very suitable tribunal, is substituted for the justices.

A very important Act, passed in 1864, also demands attention. That is "The Improvement of Land Act, 1864," which for the first time enables landowners, under certain circumstances, to raise money upon the security of their estates for making permanent railways for purposes connected with the improvement of the estate, and to charge their lands with money subscribed for the construction of railways. Twenty years ago, any attempt to pass such a Bill would have been hopeless. But the passing it shows the change of public feeling with regard to railways. That which was formerly considered a nuisance, is now looked upon in its true and proper aspect, as beneficial and an "improvement."

The Editor cannot conclude these remarks without calling attention to the fact, that the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 89, post, p. 580, (exempting stock-in-trade from liability to be rated to the poor-rate,) has only been continued till 1st October next, and thence to the end of the next Session of Parliament. The present time would therefore seem to afford a fit opportunity for the Legislature to yield to the earnest and oft-expressed wishes of the Judges, and lay down some rules for the rating of Railways to the poor-rate, which might remove the difficulties which at present exist in applying the Parochial Assessment Act to that species of property.

TO

THE SECOND EDITION.

SINCE the First Edition of this book was published, the decisions in Law and Equity, on the various subjects treated of therein, have been as numerous as they are novel and important. It has been a work of great labour to codify these decisions, so as to weave them into the original Treatise—and so difficult in its execution—that it was only the recollection of the generous allowance made for former shortcomings, which encouraged the Writer to proceed until his task was accomplished.

Joint Stock Companies Registration Act" (b), which required railway companies to be registered. But that act, as well as various other acts of Parliament subsequently passed on the subject, has been repealed; and the act now in force for consolidating and amending the laws relating to the incorporation, regulation and winding-up of trading companies and other associations, is "The Companies Act, 1862" (c), which repealed all the previous acts, and came into operation on the 2nd of November in that year. It becomes therefore unnecessary in this edition to notice the previous acts or the decisions upon them (d); and our object in this chapter will be to notice such of the provisions of "The Companies Act, 1862," as apply to the constitution and incorporation of railway companies. It is obvious, however, that they apply to other companies as well as railway companies.

There are so many difficulties attending the transactions of a railway company not registered in accordance with the provisions of "The Companies Act, 1862," or incorporated by special Act of Parliament,—(for though not exactly partners in the strict sense of that term, the projectors may very likely, without intending to do so, incur a liability similar to that of partners (e); and if the company consists of more than twenty persons, it will be illegal, unless registered (f),)—that when a sufficient number of persons, i. e. seven or more, can agree as to the formation of a company for the purpose of making a railway, the best course for them to pursue, until they can get a special Act of Parliament conferring the necessary powers upon them, is to avail themselves of the provisions of the Act of 1862, and register themselves as a preliminary company for the purpose of obtaining a special Act of Parliament.

(b) 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. In Shaw v. Holland, 15 M. & W. 136; 4 Railw. Cas. 150; 15 Law J. (Exch.), 87, where a company was incorporated by an act of Parliament previously to the 1st November, 1844, and they afterwards raised additional capital under a new subscription contract, for the purpose of applying to Parliament to form an extension line of railway, to be called "The Shipley and Colne Railway," and there were some shareholders in that railway who had no interest in the original line, it was decided, that the shareholders in the Shipley and Colne Railway were not a company the formation of which commenced after the 1st November, 1844, within the meaning of the 2nd section of this statute. (e) In Bright v. Hutton, 3 H. L. C. 368, Lord Wensleydale said, "In the case of provisional committees, or the projectors of a company, it is now perfectly well settled law, and acted upon in every court of law in Westminster Hall, that there is no partnership between them, no common power of binding each other merely by such a relation; each binds himself by his own acts only. There are, therefore, very few creditors of such a body collectively, though many of one, two, three or more acting individuals, who compose the committee, or are projectors; and so there may be a series of contracts to which there are different contributories, according as they have been authorized by different persons, very few binding all, and those only upon the rare accident of each individual authorizing that particular contract." See also Hamilton v. Smith, 5 Jur. (N. S.) 32.

Where, indeed, all landowners and other parties beneficially interested are consenting to the making of a railway or the execution of new works connected with or for the purposes of existing railways, they may obtain power to do so by a certificate from the Board of Trade, on complying with the conditions of "The Railways Construction Facilities Act, 1864" (g), without being obliged to procure a special act. And in certain cases railway companies already established may obtain further powers by a similar certificate from the Board of Trade, on complying with the conditions of "The Railway Companies Powers Act, 1864" (h). Both these acts are printed at length in the Appendix; they are, therefore, not further adverted to here. But it is to be observed that, on any such application to the Board of Trade, proceedings before the Board may be stopped by any railway or canal company which would be affected in any way by the proposed certificate, and is desirous of being heard against the application, lodging a notice (in writing) of opposition at the office of the Board of Trade; in which case further proceedings must be in Parliament (i). No provision, however, is made for individuals opposing the application.

But let us shortly consider the provisions of "The Companies Act, 1862."

The Companies Act, 1862.

By sect. 4 it is enacted, that no company, association or partnership consisting of more than twenty persons, shall be formed (j) for the purpose of carrying on any other business [than banking] that has for its object the acquisition of gain by the company, association or partnership, or by the individual members thereof, unless it is registered as a company under that act, or is formed in pursuance of some other act of Parliament, or of letters-patent, or is engaged in working mines in the stannaries.

Prohibition of partnerships of more than twenty persons unless registered.

Sect. 6. Any seven or more (k) persons associated for any lawful purpose may, by subscribing their names to a memorandum of association, and otherwise complying with the requisitions of this act in respect of registration, form an incorporated company, with or without limited liability.

Mode of forming company.

Sect. 7. The liability of the members of a company formed under this act may, according to the memorandum of association, be limited either to the amount, if any, unpaid on the shares respectively held by them, or to such amount as the members may respectively undertake by the memorandum of association to contribute to the assets of the company in the event of its being wound up.

2. Memorandum of Association of Company under "The Companies Act, 1862."

Memorandum of association of a company limited by shares.

Where a company is formed on the principle of having the liability of its members limited to the amount unpaid on their shares (l), the memorandum of association must contain the following things:—

1. The name of the proposed company, with the addition of the word "limited" as the last word in such name (m).
2. The part of the United Kingdom, whether England, Scotland or Ireland, in which the registered office of the company is proposed to be situate.
3. The objects for which the proposed company is to be established.
4. A declaration that the liability of the members is limited.
5. The amount of capital with which the company proposed to be registered, divided into shares of a certain fixed amount,

Subject to the following regulations:—

1. That no subscriber shall take less than one share.
2. That each subscriber of the memorandum of association shall write opposite to his name the number of shares he takes (n).

Memorandum of association of a company limited by guarantee.

When a company is formed on the principle of having the liability of its members limited to such amount as the members respectively undertake to contribute to the assets of the company, in the event of the same being wound up, the memorandum of association (o) must contain the following things:—

1. } The same as in the case of a company limited by shares.

4. A declaration that each member undertakes to contribute to the assets of the company, in the event of the same being wound up during the time that he is a member, or within one year afterwards, for

(l) A company, limited by shares, may so far modify the conditions contained in this memorandum of association, if authorized to do so by its regulations as originally framed, or as altered by special resolution in manner hereinafter mentioned, as to increase its capital by the issue of new shares of such amount as it thinks expedient, or to consolidate and divide its capital into shares of larger amount than its existing shares, or to convert its paid-up shares into stock; but save as aforesaid, and save as is provided in the case of a change of name, no alteration can be made by any company in the conditions contained in its memorandum of association. Sect. 12. Semble, this would not authorize the issue of preference shares. Moss v. Syers, 32 L. J. (Ch.) 711.

(m) But this name must not be identical with that by which a subsisting company is already registered or so nearly resembling the same as to be calculated to deceive. Sect. 20. As to change of name, see sect. 13, and 26 & 27 Vict. c. 118, s. 36, et seq., post, Appendix.

payment of the debts and liabilities of the company contracted before the time at which he ceases to be a member, and of the costs, charges and expenses of winding-up the company, and for the adjustment of the rights of the contributories amongst themselves such amount as may be required, not exceeding a specified amount (p).

Where a company is formed on the principle of having no limit placed on the liability of its members, the memorandum of association (q) must contain the following things:—

Of an unlimited company.

1. The name (r) of the proposed company.
2. The part of the United Kingdom, whether England, Scotland or Ireland, in which the registered office of the company is proposed to be situate.
3. The objects for which the proposed company is to be established (s).

The memorandum of association must bear the same stamp as if it were a deed and be signed by each subscriber in the presence of and be attested by one witness at least. It will, when registered, bind the company and the members thereof to the same extent as if each member had subscribed his name and affixed his seal thereto, and there were in the memorandum contained, on the part of himself, his heirs, executors and administrators, a covenant to observe all the conditions of such memorandum, subject to the provisions of the Act of 1862.

3. Articles of Association.

The memorandum of association may, in the case of a company limited by shares, and must, in the case of a company limited by guarantee or unlimited, be accompanied, when registered, by articles of association signed by the subscribers to the memorandum, and prescribing such regulations for the company as the subscribers to the memorandum deem expedient. The articles must be expressed in separate paragraphs, numbered arithmetically, and may adopt all or any of the provisions contained in Table A. in the first schedule to the act (t). They must, in the case of a company, whether limited by guarantee or unlimited, that has a capital divided into shares, state the amount of capital with which the company proposes to be registered; and, in the case of a company, whether limited by guarantee or unlimited, that has not a capital divided into shares, state the number of members with which the company proposes to be registered, for the purpose of enabling the registrar to determine the fees

In the case of a company limited by shares, if the memorandum is not accompanied by articles of association, or in so far as the articles do not exclude or modify the regulations contained in Table A. (x), those regulations will, so far as they are applicable, be deemed to be the regulations of the company, in the same manner and to the same extent as if they had been inserted in articles of association, and the articles had been duly registered (y).

Stamp, signature,
articles.

The articles must be printed; stamped like a deed; and signed by each subscriber in the presence of, and attested by, one witness at least. When registered, they will bind the company and the members thereof to the same extent as if each member had subscribed his name and affixed his seal thereto, and there were in such articles contained a covenant on the part of himself, his heirs, executors and administrators, to conform to all the regulations contained in such articles, subject to the provisions of the Act of 1862; and all monies payable by any member to the company in pursuance of the conditions and regulations of the company, or any of such conditions or regulations, shall be deemed to be a debt due from such member to the company; and in England and Ireland to be in the nature of a specialty debt (z).

4. General Provisions.

Registration of memorandum and articles.

Fees.

The memorandum and articles of association, if any, must be delivered to the registrar of joint-stock companies, who will retain and register them; and the fees specified in Table B., in the first schedule to the Act of 1862 (a), must be paid to the registrar by a company having a capital divided into shares; and the fees specified in Table C. by a company not having a capital divided into shares (b).

Certificate.

Upon registration the registrar will certify that the company is incorporated (c); and, in the case of a limited company, that the company is limited. The subscribers of the memorandum, together with such other persons as may from time to time become members of the company, will thereupon be a body corporate by the name contained in the memorandum, capable forthwith of exercising all the functions of an incorporated company, and having perpetual succession and a common seal, with power to hold lands, but with such liability on the part of the members to contribute to the assets of the company, in the event of its being wound up as hereinafter mentioned (d).

Copies of the memorandum and articles must be forwarded to every member on request, on payment of one shilling, under a penalty of one pound (e).

Besides the provisions we have already noticed, the Companies Act, 1862, contains others relating to—

Second part. The distribution of the capital and liability of members of companies and associations.

Third part. The management and administration of companies and associations.

Fourth part. The winding-up of companies and associations.

Fifth part. The Registration Office.

Sixth part. Application of the act to companies registered under the [old] joint-stock companies acts.

Seventh part. Companies authorized to register under the Act of 1862.

Eighth part. Application of the act to unregistered companies.

Ninth part. Repeal of acts and temporary provisions.

But as the act is printed at length in the Appendix, it is not thought necessary to advert to its provisions any further in this place: more especially as railway companies cannot well be practically worked without a private act of Parliament; the proper course of proceeding to obtain which is pointed out in the following chapter.

COURSE OF PROCEEDING UPON RAILWAY BILLS IN PARLIAMENT.

1. Progress of the Bill through the Commons.

Works extant on the law and practice of Parliament.

IT is not the object of this work to treat of the law and practice of Parliament, in proceeding with private bills. Several able publications are already extant upon this subject (a); and as all railway bills are entrusted to the care of parliamentary agents (b), who are intimately acquainted with the practice of Parliament, it is unnecessary to discuss such matters in detail. But, as the course of procedure observed in passing a railway bill through Parliament may be a matter of interest to many persons, a short summary of the proceedings which take place, is given in the text; and a reference is also given to the Standing Orders of both Houses of Parliament, issued for the Session 1865, so far as they relate to railway bills, and the formation of the committees to which they are referred (c).

In which House railway bills originate.

By the privilege of the House of Commons, all bills which involve pecuniary charge upon the Queen's subjects must originate in that house (d); and consequently railway bills were formerly passed first in the Commons. But in 1858, pursuant to the recommendation of the committee on railway and canal legislation, it was resolved by the Commons not to insist on its privileges with regard to any clauses in private bills sent down from the House of Lords, which refer to tolls and charges for services performed, and are not in the nature of a tax (e). Consequently railway bills may now originate in either house. But for various reasons, and especially as in former editions of this work the progress of the bill through the Commons was first considered, it is thought desirable to adhere to that arrangement in the present edition.

(b) Various duties and responsibilities are imposed upon the parliamentary agent who has charge of a Private Bill in the Commons. He is personally responsible for the observance of the rules prescribed by Parliament, and also for the payment of all fees and charges; and is subject to other regulations imposed by Speaker's Orders. See further on this subject, May on the Law and Usage of Parliament, 640, 4th ed.

(c) In the first edition of this work the Standing Orders were printed at length. Two reasons have led to their omission in subsequent editions, viz., first, the author's great desire that the work should be confined to moderate limits,—and, secondly, the experience, that the Standing Orders for one year cannot be taken as a safe guide in any subsequent years. The Standing Orders in both Houses of Parliament are now published annually at a moderate cost; and the last authorized edition of them ought to be obtained by the promoters of any railway bill, as no other version of them can be relied upon.

At the commencement of each Session the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means seeks a conference with the Chairman of Committees of the House of Lords, for the purpose of determining in which House of Parliament the respective private bills should be first considered, and such determination is reported to the House (f).

Decided on conference between chairmen of committees.

Let us then proceed to notice some of the principal preliminary matters required by the Standing Orders of both Houses, compliance with which must be proved before one of the Examiners of petitions for private bills (g), before any railway bill can be introduced into either the House of Commons or the House of Lords.

But it must first be remarked, that no private bill can be brought into the House of Commons but upon a petition first presented, which has been duly deposited in the Private Bill Office (h), and indorsed by one of the examiners, with a printed copy of the proposed bill annexed. And such petition must be signed by the parties, or some of them, who are suitors for the bill (i). We shall presently see that this petition must be presented on or before 23rd December; and before the petition is presented, certain notices to owners, &c., must be given. In the House of Lords, however, railway bills are excepted from the rule which requires a petition to be presented for leave to bring in a private bill (k). But a printed copy of every railway bill proposed to be introduced in either House, must be deposited in the office of the clerk of the Parliaments, on or before the 23rd December (l).

Petition for bill in Commons.

Not in Lords.

The requirements of the Standing Orders, which, except where specially noticed, are the same in both Houses, have been arranged in the following order:—

1. Notices by advertisement.
2. Notices and applications to owners, lessees and occupiers of lands and houses.
3. Documents required to be deposited, and the times and places of deposit.
4. Form in which plans, books of reference, sections and cross-sections shall be prepared.
5. Estimates and deposit of money and declarations. Each of which it is proposed to treat separately. Compliance with these

1. Notices by Advertisement.

Notices to state objects of application and powers intended to be applied for.

It is required by the Standing Orders of both Houses (m), that—

“ In all cases where application is intended to be made for leave to bring in a bill relating to making, maintaining, varying, extending or enlarging any railway, notices shall be given stating the objects of such intended application, and the time at which copies of the bill will be deposited in the Private Bill Office; and if it be intended to apply for powers for the compulsory purchase of lands or houses; or for extending the time granted by any former act for that purpose; or to amalgamate with any other company; or to sell or lease the undertaking; or to purchase or take on lease the undertaking of any other company; or to amend or repeal any former act or acts; or to levy any tolls, rates or duties; or to alter any existing tolls, rates or duties; or to confer, vary or extinguish any exemptions from payment of tolls, rates or duties; or to confer, vary or extinguish any other rights or privileges;—the notices shall specify such intention; and the whole of the notice relating to the same bill shall be included in the same advertisement, which shall be headed by a short title descriptive of the undertaking or bill [and see Order 67].

Notices to contain names of parishes, &c.

“ Such notices shall also contain a description of all the termini, together with the names of the parishes, townships, townlands and extra-parochial places from, in, through or into which the work is intended to be made, maintained, varied, extended or enlarged, or in which any lands or houses intended to be taken are situate; and shall state the time and place of deposit of the plans, sections, books of reference and copies of the Gazette notice respectively, with the clerks of the peace, sheriff clerks, parish clerks, clerks of vestries or district boards, schoolmasters, session clerks, town clerks and clerks of unions, as the case may be (n). (See Nos. 29, 30, 36 and 37, post, p. 13.)

Publication of notices in Gazettes and newspaper.

“ In the months of October and November, or either of them, immediately preceding the application for a bill, such notices shall be published once in the London, Edinburgh or Dublin Gazette, as the case may be, and in three successive weeks in some one and the same newspaper of the county in which the city, county of a city, town, county of a town, or lands to which such bill relates, shall be situate; or if there be no newspaper published therein, then in the newspaper of some county adjoining or near thereto; and if such bill relate specially to any particular city, county of a city, town or county of a town in which any newspaper is published, such notices shall be published in three successive weeks in one and the same newspaper published therein; or if such bill do not relate to any particular city, county of a city, town, county of a town, or lands, such notices shall be published once in the London, Edinburgh or Dublin Gazette only, as the case may be; and if such bill relate to lands situate in more than one county, such notices shall be inserted once in each of three successive weeks in some newspaper or newspapers which shall be published in London at least six days in the week, or in Edinburgh or Dublin at least two days in the week, as the case may be; and in a newspaper of the county in which the principal office of the company or companies, or other parties who are the promoters of any such bill, shall be situate; and in a newspaper of every county in which any new works are proposed to be constructed, or in which any lands are situate, in respect of which any new or further powers for the completion of works already authorized are intended to be applied for” (o).

2. Notices and Applications to Owners, Lessees and Occupiers of Lands and Houses.

Application to owners, &c., on or before December 15.

It is also required by the Standing Orders of both Houses (p), that—

In the case of any bill for making any work, in the construction of which compulsory power is sought to take thirty houses or more inhabited by the labouring classes in any one parish or place, the promoters are required by the Lords' Standing Orders (r) to deposit in the office of the Clerk of the Parliaments, on or before the 31st day of December, a statement of the number, description and situation of the said houses; the number (so far as they can be estimated) of persons to be displaced, and whether any and what provision is made in the bill for remedying the inconvenience likely to arise from such displacement; and that such statement be referred to the committee on the bill, and that the said committee do inquire into and report thereon.

Statement relating to houses inhabited by the labouring classes to be deposited in the office of the Clerk of the Parliaments.

4. Form in which Plans, Books of Reference, Sections, and Cross Sections shall be prepared.

The Commons' Standing Orders, 46 to 58, describe with great particularity the form in which plans, books of reference, sections, and cross sections must be prepared, and there is a model plan annexed to the Standing Orders. It has been thought better not to incumber this work with these Orders, as any one preparing them cannot safely dispense with a copy of the last Standing Orders, by which he must be guided.

The corresponding Lords' Standing Orders are clxxxiii. 1—13.

5. Estimates and Deposit of Money and Declarations in certain Cases.

59. An estimate of the expense of the undertaking shall be made and signed by the person making the same (s). Estimate.

60. A sum not less than eight per cent. on the amount of the estimate of expense shall, previously to the 15th day of January, be deposited with the Court of Chancery in England, if the work is intended to be done in England, or with the Court of Chancery in England or the Court of Exchequer in Scotland, if such work is intended to be done in Scotland, and with the Court of Chancery in Ireland, if such work is intended to be done in Ireland (t).

(t) C. S. O. 60. The L. S. O. clxxxiv. 2, is the same, except that in the case of substituted works they require a deposit of eight per cent. on the amount, by which the expense thereof will exceed the expense of the works to be abandoned. The deposit need not be the actual property of the promoters, Scott v. Oakley, 10 L. T. (N. S.) 322. As to the custody of these monies, see 9 & 10 Vict. c. 20, Appendix, post. Since these orders were made, in 1858, both Houses have discontinued the requirement of subscription contracts.

Cases wherein declaration is deposited.

61. Where the work is to be made wholly or in part by means of funds, or out of money to be raised upon the credit of present surplus revenue belonging to any society or company, or under the control of directors, trustees or commissioners, as the case may be, of any existing public work; such parties being the promoters of the bill, a declaration stating those facts and setting forth the nature of such control, and the nature and amount of such funds or surplus revenue, and showing the actual surplus of such funds or revenue, after deducting the funds required for purposes authorized by any act or acts of Parliament, and also the funds which may be required for any other work to be executed under any bill in the same session, and given under the common seal of the society or company, or under the hand of some authorized officer of such directors, trustees or commissioners, may be deposited, and in such case no deposit of money shall be required in respect of so much of the estimate of expense, as shall be provided for by such surplus funds (u).

Cases wherein declaration and estimate of rates may be deposited.

62. In cases where the work is to be made out of money to be raised upon the security of the rates, duties or revenue, to be created by, or to arise under any bill under which no private or personal pecuniary profit or advantage is to be derived, a declaration stating those facts and setting forth the means by which funds are to be obtained for executing the work, and signed by the party or agent soliciting the bill, together with an estimate of the probable amount of such rates, duties or revenue, signed by the person making the same, may be deposited, and in such case no deposit of money shall be required (x).

Memorials complaining of non-compliance with Standing Orders.

When the time has expired for depositing the documents already specified, the parties interested can judge whether the Standing Orders have been complied with by the promoters, and if not, they may, if so disposed, take advantage of any mistakes by preparing memorials complaining of such non-compliance. But they cannot in such memorial go into the principle of the bill, as the examiners have no power to go into such questions (y). These memorials are addressed in the Commons, "To the Examiner of Petitions for Private Bills," and in the Lords, "To the Examiner of Standing Orders for Private Bills," and are prepared in the same form and subject to the same general rules as petitions to the House as well as to other special rules (z). Any parties are entitled to appear and be heard by themselves, their agents and witnesses upon a memorial; provided the matter complained of be specifically stated in the memorial, and the party (if any), who may be specially affected by the non-compliance with the Standing Orders, has signed the memorial and not withdrawn his signature thereto, and such memorial has been duly deposited in the Private Bill Office. [See Orders 191, 215, 216, 217 and 218] (a).

And in the case of any petitions for bills which may be deposited by leave of the House after the 23rd December, such memorials must be deposited three clear days before the day first appointed for the examination of the petition.

These memorials must be deposited in the Private Bill Office before 6 P.M. of any day on which the House sits, and before 2 P.M. of any day on which the House does not sit, and two copies must be deposited for the use of the examiners before twelve o'clock on the following day (b).

In the House of Lords every such memorial must be deposited in the office of the Clerk of the Parliaments, together with two copies thereof, before twelve o'clock on the day preceding that appointed for the examination of the bill (c).

Proceedings before the Examiners.

The examination of petitions for private bills which have been duly deposited in the Private Bill Office (d), and private bills which have been duly deposited in the office of the Clerk of the Parliaments (e), commences on 18th January, in such order and subject to such regulations as shall have been made by Mr. Speaker (f). One of the examiners must give at least seven clear days' notice in the Private Bill Office of the day appointed for the examination of each petition (g), but practically much longer notice has been given (h). The clerks in the Private Bill Office prepare daily lists of all petitions upon which any examiner is appointed to sit, specifying the hour of meeting and the room where the examiner will sit, and the list is hung up in the lobby of the House (i).

These lists are divided into opposed and unopposed cases, the latter being first disposed of (k). If the promoters do not appear when their petition is called on, it is struck off the general list of petitions and cannot be re-inserted except by order of the House (l), made on petition; which will be referred to the Standing Orders Committee, who report to the House (m). If the promoters appear, they must prove compliance with the Standing Orders of both Houses of Parliament, which may be done by affidavit (n), unless the examiner requires further evidence. seen, any parties who have presented a memorial are entitled to appear and be heard.

Dissenting proprietors to be allowed to be heard.

73. In case any proprietor in any company shall by himself or any person authorized to act for him in that behalf, have dissented at any meeting called in pursuance of S. O. 66 or 67, such proprietor shall be permitted to be heard by the examiner of petitions, on the compliance with such Standing Order, by himself, his agents and witnesses, on a memorial addressed to the examiner, or by the committee on the proposed bill, by himself, his counsel, or agents and witnesses, on a petition presented to the House, such memorial or petition having been duly deposited in the Private Bill Office. [See Orders 124, 215 and 218] (o).

Statement of proofs.

A general statement of proofs will be required by the examiner and another copy by the committee clerk, comprising the Standing Orders of both Houses, and distinguishing any orders peculiar to either House by a reference to such orders in the margin. This general statement must be in the same form as the printed statement required for the House of Lords. There must also be a printed statement, in a form which may be obtained at the Queen's printers, of compliance with the Standing Orders of the House of Lords.

Examiner's certificate.

The examiner will certify by indorsement on the petition whether the Standing Orders have or have not been complied with (p). In the latter case he will report to the House the facts upon which his decision is founded and any special circumstances. If he feels doubts as to the due construction of any Standing Order, he will make a special report of the facts without deciding, and indorse the petition "Special Report," or "Special Report, Standing Orders not complied with," and send such special report with the certificate (q).

Standing Orders not complied with.

If the examiner reports that the Standing Orders have not been complied with, his report is referred to the select committee on Standing Orders (r), who report to the House whether such Standing Orders ought or ought not to be dispensed with, and whether the parties should be allowed to proceed with the bill, and under what (if any) conditions (s). If their report is unfavourable, the bill is lost, and the promoters must begin de novo next session. If the examiner make a special report, that likewise is referred to the select committee on Standing Orders (t), who determine whether the Standing Orders have been complied with or not, and report to the House, or consider the question of dispensing with Standing Orders (u).

Special report.

Dispensing with Standing Orders in Commons.

In the House of Commons petitions for dispensation with Standing Orders must be deposited at the Private Bill Office, and stand referred to the select committee on Standing Orders (x).

In Lords.

In the House of Lords, the party praying for such dispensation sets forth in a written statement the grounds on which he rests his prayer, and the opposing party, the grounds on which he rests his opposition, both parties confining themselves strictly to the points reported on (y). These statements must be lodged in the office of the Clerk of the Parliaments, not later than five o'clock, on the day before the day on which the committee meets. If the committee think fit they hear the parties in explanation of their written statements (z). They then make a report whether or not the Standing Orders have been complied with, or if not, whether, in their opinion, they ought to be dispensed with (a).

When the examiner certifies that the Standing Orders have been complied with, and indorses the petition to that effect, it is returned to the agent, who arranges for its presentation to the House of Commons by a member. Copies of the bill must be laid before the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means and the counsel to the Speaker, not later than the day after the examiner has indorsed the petition for the bill (b); and two clear days at least before the day appointed for the consideration of the bill by a committee, there must be laid before the same officers by the agent, copies of the bill as proposed to be submitted to the committee, and such copies must be signed by the agent for the bill (c). It is the duty of these two officers to examine all private bills, whether opposed or not, and call the attention of the House, and also the chairman of the committee, on every opposed private bill, to all points which may appear to him to require it (d). The Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means may also at any period after the bill has been referred to a committee, report to the House any special circumstances relative thereto which appear to him to require it, or inform the House that in his opinion it ought to be treated as an opposed bill, although unopposed (e), in which latter case it will be referred to the general committee on railway and canal bills (f).

With respect to the presentation of the petition for the bill, it is to be observed, that a bill is always entrusted to one or two members of the House, who attend at the sitting of the House, and make such motions as are necessary to forward its progress. The bill is brought into the House upon a petition, first presented and duly deposited in the Private Bill Office, and indorsed by the examiner, with a printed copy of the bill annexed, the petition being signed by some of the parties who are suitors for the bill (g). This petition for the bill must be presented on a day, not later than three clear days after

The bill printed on paper, of a size determined on by the Speaker, must be presented to the House with a cover of parchment attached to it, upon which the title of the bill must be written and the short title of the bill as first entered on the votes, must correspond with that at the head of the advertisement (l). The proposed amount of all rates, tolls, and other matters, must be inserted in italics in the printed bill annexed to the petition (m). The bill must be printed, and printed copies delivered to the doorkeepers for the use of members before the first reading (n).

Bill read first and second time.

The bill having passed the Standing Orders, is read a first and afterwards a second time, and then stands referred to the general committee on railway and canal bills (o). But there must not be less than three clear days, nor more than seven between the first and second reading, unless the bill has been referred to the examiners of petitions, in which case it must not be read a second time later than seven clear days after the reports of the examiner or the select committee on Standing Orders (p). And there must be eight clear days between the second reading of the bill and the sitting of the committee thereupon (q). Petitions in favour of or against the bill, or otherwise relating thereto (not being a petition for additional provision), must be presented to the House by depositing the same in the Private Bill Office, and there must be indorsed thereon the name or short title by which the bill is entered in the votes, and a statement that such petition is in favour of or against the bill, or otherwise, as the case may be, together with the name of the member, party or agent, depositing the same (r). All petitions against railway bills (s), and any report made under the authority of any public department, stand referred to the committee on the bill (t).

No petitioners will be heard before the committee unless their petition has been prepared and signed in strict conformity with the rules and orders of the House, and have been presented by having been deposited in the Private Bill Office not later than ten clear days after the first reading of the bill, except where the petitioners complain of any matter which may have arisen during the progress of the bill before the committee, or of any proposed additional provision, or of the amendments as proposed in the filled up bill deposited in the Private Bill Office (x).

Reference to
Ways and Means.

By a resolution of the House of Commons, made on 16th February, 1864, which, however, has not been made a Standing Order, the committee of selection and the general committee on railway and canal bills, at any time after the committal of bills, may, with the consent of all parties promoting and opposing, refer the same wholly or with reference to particular clauses to the Chairman of Ways and Means; and such chairman, together with members to be appointed in like manner as members of a committee on unopposed bills, are empowered to hear the parties promoting and opposing such bills, or their agents, and to report upon the same to the House.

And with regard to referees on private railway bills, the following Standing Orders were agreed to in 1864, though they will probably be modified or altered next session.

Referees on private bills to be constituted.

88. The Chairman of Ways and Means, with not less than three other persons, who shall be appointed by Mr. Speaker for such period as he shall think fit, shall be referees of the House on private bills; such referees to form one or more courts; three at least to be required to constitute each court; provided that the chairman of any second court shall be a member of this House; and provided that no such referee, if he be a member of this House, shall receive any salary.

Rules of practice and procedure to be made by Chairman of Ways and Means.

89. The practice and procedure of the referees, their times of sitting, order of business, and the forms and notices required in their proceedings, shall be prescribed by rules to be framed by the Chairman of Ways and Means, subject to alteration by him as occasion may require; but only one counsel shall appear before such referees in support of a private bill, or in support of any petition in opposition thereto. All such rules and alterations, when made, to be laid on the table of the House.

Jurisdiction of referees defined.

90. The referees shall inquire into all or any of the following matters, as to which parties petitioning against any bill desire to be heard in opposition, viz.:—

1. In the case of bills of the second class, for authorizing the construction of works (l), the engineering details of the undertaking, the efficiency of the works for the proposed object, and the sufficiency of the estimate for executing the same.

Referees to report to the House.

91. So soon as the inquiry into the matters referred to them upon any bill has been completed, the referees shall make their report upon the same to the House, stating the facts upon which their opinion is founded, and the report shall thereupon stand referred to the select committee on the bill. No further evidence shall be taken by the committee to prove or disprove any of the facts reported by the referees.

Committees on bills empowered to refer questions in special cases to referees.

92. The select committee to which any bill has been referred may, subject to the approval of the Chairman of Ways and Means, refer any question arising in the course of their inquiry which they may deem suitable to be so referred to the referees for their decision; such question to be stated in writing and signed by the chairman of the committee. The referees, so soon as their inquiry has been completed, to return the question, with their decision certified thereon, to the chairman.

Various duties are imposed by the Standing Orders on the committee to which the bill may be referred. They are required to insist on the introduction of certain clauses in the bill, and also to report specially upon many points which are specially mentioned for their consideration.

The committee on the bill.

Thus, the Commons Standing Orders require that,—

145. In the case of a railway bill, no company shall be authorized to raise, by loan or mortgage, a larger sum than one-third of their capital; and, until fifty per cent. on the whole of the capital shall have been paid up, it shall not be in the power of the company to raise any money by loan or mortgage (m).

Standing Orders, 1865.

Restrictions as to mortgage.

146. Where the level of any road shall be altered in making any railway, the ascent of any turnpike road, or of any road in Ireland, so defined in the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, shall not be more than one foot in thirty feet; and of any other public carriage road, not more than one foot in twenty feet; unless a report thereupon from some officer of the Board of Trade shall be laid before the committee on the bill, and unless the committee, after considering such report, if they shall disagree with the said report, shall recommend steeper ascents, with reasons and facts upon which their opinion is founded. Also, a good and sufficient fence, of four feet high at the least, shall be made on each side of every bridge which shall be erected (n).

Limiting ascent of roads where level is altered.

Fence to bridge.

147. No railway whereon carriages are propelled by steam, or by atmospheric agency, or drawn by ropes in connexion with a stationary steam-engine, shall be made across any turnpike road or other public carriage way on the level, unless a report thereupon from some officer of the Board of Trade shall be laid before the committee on the bill, and unless the committee, after considering such report, if they shall disagree with the said report, shall recommend such level crossing, with the reasons and facts upon which their opinion is founded (o), and in every clause authorizing a level crossing, the number of lines of rails authorized to be made at such crossing shall be specified.

Railway not to cross roads on a level, unless committee report, &c.

148. No railway company shall be authorized to construct or enlarge, purchase or take on lease, or otherwise appropriate, any dock, pier, harbour or ferry, or to acquire and use any steam-vessels for the conveyance of goods and passengers, or to apply any portion of their capital or revenue to other objects, distinct from the undertaking of a railway company, unless the committee on the bill report that such a restriction ought not to be enforced, with the reasons and facts upon which their opinion is founded.

Railway company not to acquire docks, &c.

149. The committees on railway bills shall direct their attention especially to the following heads of inquiry, and shall require evidence from the promoters thereon, namely:—

Matters to be specially reported.

1. The financial arrangements made or proposed by the company formed for the execution of the railway; the number and amount of shares actually subscribed for or agreed to be taken; the amount of share capital and of loans proposed to be authorized.
2. The merits in an engineering point of view of the proposed railway, and the crossings, if any, of public roads on the level.
3. The degree of favour or objection with which the project is regarded by the landowners and others in the neighbourhood of the proposed railway.

Financial arrangements.

Engineering merits.

Opinions of landowners.

Every committee on a railway bill shall report specially to the House—

150. It shall be an instruction to the committee on every railway bill providing for the construction of any new railway, or for the extension of time for the completion of any railway, in case they shall find the preamble thereof to be proved, to insert in the bill one or other of the provisions following, that is to say :—

In every railway bill promoted by an existing railway company, being possessed of a railway already opened for public traffic, whereby the construction of any new line of railway is authorized, or the time for completing any line already authorized is extended, a clause providing that after the expiration of a period to be limited by such bill, not exceeding five years from the passing of the act, in the case of a new line, and three years in case of the extension of time for completing any line, the company so making default shall be liable to a penalty of 50*l.* per day, to be recoverable as a debt due to the Crown, for every day after the period so limited, until such line shall be completed and opened for public traffic : but no penalty shall accrue in respect of any time during which it shall appear by a certificate, to be obtained from the Board of Trade, that the company was prevented from completing or opening such line by unforeseen accident, or circumstances beyond their control.

In every railway bill promoted by an existing railway company not being possessed of a railway already opened for public traffic, or by persons not already incorporated, whereby the construction of any new line of railway is authorized, a clause to the following effect, viz. :—

Whereas, pursuant to the Standing Orders of both Houses of Parliament, and to an act of the 9th and 10th years of her present Majesty, c. 20, a sum of £ , being eight per cent. upon the amount of the estimate in respect of the railway authorized by this act, has been deposited with the Court of Chancery in England [or with the Court of Exchequer in Scotland or the Court of Chancery in Ireland, as the case may be], [or exchequer bills, stocks or funds to the amount of £ have been deposited or transferred pursuant to the said act, as the case may be], in respect of the application to Parliament for this act: be it enacted, that, notwithstanding anything contained in the said recited act, the said sum of £ [or the said exchequer bills or other funds, as the case may be] so deposited [or transferred] as aforesaid in respect of the application for this act, or the interest or dividends of such sum of money [exchequer bills, stocks or funds], shall not, except upon the execution and deposit of such bond as hereinafter mentioned, be paid or transferred to or on the application of the person or persons, or the majority of the persons named in the warrant or order issued in pursuance of the said act, or the survivors or survivor of them, unless the said company shall previously to the expiration of the period limited by this act for completion of the railway hereby authorized to be made, either open the said railway for the public conveyance of passengers, or prove to the satisfaction of the lords of the committee of her Majesty's privy council for trade and foreign plantations that the said company have paid up one-half of the amount of the capital by this act authorized to be raised by means of shares, and have expended for the purposes of this act a sum equal in amount to such one-half of the said capital ; and if the said period shall expire before the said company shall either have opened the said railway for the public conveyance of passengers, or have given such proof as aforesaid to the satisfaction of the lords of the said committee, the said sum of money [exchequer bills, stocks or funds], deposited [or transferred] as aforesaid, and the interest and dividends thereof, shall immediately, from and after the expiration of the said period, be forfeited to her Majesty, and be paid and transferred by the officer or person in whose name they shall then be deposited or invested to the account of her Majesty's exchequer, and when so paid and transferred shall be carried to and form part of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland : provided that at any time after the passing of this act, if a bond in twice the amount of the said sum of £ shall have been executed by the said company, with one or more sureties (such bond to be prepared to the satisfaction of, and such surety or sureties to be approved by the solicitor to, the Lords Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury), conditioned for payment to her Majesty, her heirs or successors, of the said sum of £ , if the said company shall not, within the time limited for the completion of the said railway, either open the said railway for the public conveyance of passengers, or prove to the satisfaction of the lords of the said committee that the said company have paid up one-half of the amount of the said capital by this act authorized to be raised by means of shares, and have expended for the purposes of this act a sum equal in amount to such one-half of the said capital; and if such bond shall have been deposited with the said solicitor to the said lords commissioners, then such sum of money [exchequer bills, stocks or funds], and the interest or dividends thereof, shall be paid [or transferred] to or on the application of the person or persons, or the majority of the persons named in such warrant or order as aforesaid, or the survivors or survivor of them, and it shall not be necessary to produce any certificate of this act having passed, anything in the said recited act to the contrary notwithstanding; and the monies to be recovered upon such bond shall be dealt with in like manner as the said sum of money [exchequer bills, stocks or funds], and the interest or dividends thereof, would have been dealt with under this act if such bond had not been executed and deposited as aforesaid. And the certificate of the said solicitor to the said lords commissioners, that such bond has been executed and deposited as aforesaid, and the certificate of the lords of the said committee that such proof has been given to their satisfaction as aforesaid, shall respectively be sufficient evidence of the facts so certified.

In any railway bill to which the preceding provisions are not applicable, the committee shall make such other provision as they shall deem necessary for ensuring the completion of the line of railway.

*Provisions to be made in special

151. The committee on every railway bill shall fix the tolls, and shall determine the maximum rates of charge for the conveyance of passengers, with a due amount of luggage and of goods on such railway, and such rates of charge shall include the tolls and the costs of locomotive power, and every other expense connected with the conveyance of passengers, with a due amount of luggage and of goods upon such railway; but if the committee shall not deem it expedient to determine such maximum rates of charge, a special report, explanatory of the grounds of their omitting so to do, shall be made to the House, which special report shall accompany the report of the bill.

the tolls and charges.*

152. In every railway bill by which it is proposed to authorize the company to grant any preference or priority in the payment of interest or dividends on any shares or stock, there shall be inserted a clause providing that the granting of such preference or priority shall not prejudice or affect any preference or priority in the payment of interest or dividends on any other shares or stock, which shall have been granted by the company in pursuance of, or which may have been confirmed by, any previous Act of Parliament, or which may otherwise be lawfully subsisting, unless the committee on the bill shall report that such provision ought not to be required, with the reasons on which their opinion is founded.

acts a sum equal thereto; and in case such powers shall be applied for in respect of works intended to be authorized by any bill or bills of the same session, it shall be proved to the satisfaction of the Board of Trade that such companies have respectively paid up one-half the amount of their capital, and that the company proposed to be empowered to construct such works have included in such amount the capital proposed to be authorized by such bill or bills; and that no such powers shall be given in respect of works intended to be authorized by any act or acts by which it is intended to apply in any subsequent session (q).

157. No railway company shall be authorized, except for the execution of its original line or lines sanctioned by Act of Parliament, to guarantee interest on any shares which it may issue for creating additional capital, or to guarantee any rent or dividend to any other railway company, until such first-mentioned company shall have completed and opened for traffic such original lines (r).

158. In bills for the amalgamation of railway companies, the amount of capital created by such amalgamation shall in no case exceed the sum of the capitals of the companies so amalgamated (s).

159. In bills for empowering any railway company to purchase any other railway, no addition shall be authorized to be made to the capital of the purchasing company, beyond the amount of the capital of the railway purchased; and in case such railway shall be purchased at a premium, no addition on account of such premium shall be made to the capital of the purchasing company (t).

160. A clause shall be inserted in every railway bill prohibiting the payment of any interest or dividend in respect of calls under such bill (except the interest by way of discount on subscriptions prepaid, agreeably to 8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, s. 24), out of any capital which they have been authorized to raise either by means of calls or of any power of borrowing (u).

161. A clause shall be inserted in every railway bill prohibiting any railway company from paying out of the capital, which they have been authorized to raise for the purposes of any existing act, the deposits required by the Standing Orders, to be made for the purposes of any application to Parliament for a bill for the construction of another railway (x).

162. The following clause shall be inserted in all railway bills passing through this House:—

And be it further enacted, that nothing herein contained shall be deemed or construed to exempt the railway by this or the said recited acts authorized to be made, from the provisions of any general act relating to railways now in force, or which may hereafter pass during this or any future session of Parliament, or from any future revision and alteration, under the authority of Parliament, of the maximum rates of fares and charges authorized by this act [or by the said recited acts].

163. Where it is sought by any bill to give parliamentary sanction to any agreement, such agreement shall be annexed to the bill as a schedule thereto, and shall be printed in extenso therewith.

Having thus pointed out the various rules laid down for the guidance of the committee, we may here remark that they have no power to examine into the compliance with any of the Standing Orders, which are directed to be proved before the examiners of petitions, unless by special order of the House (y). Neither have the committee any power to compel the appearance of witnesses before them, or the production of papers or records. Such evidence is usually procured by the promoters or opponents of the bill. It is usual, when the committee ascertain that such evidence cannot be procured without the interference of the House, to make a special report, and the House thereupon issues the necessary order (z).

When witnesses are produced, however, the committee may examine them upon oath (a). The committee on the bill.

They may also receive affidavits in proof of compliance with such Standing Orders as are directed to be proved before them (b).

On the day appointed for the meeting of the committee, the parties, their counsel and agents, are called into the committee-room, and the committee clerk reads a list of the petitions which have been presented against the bills of which the group is composed. No uniform rule is adopted by committees, as to the order in which the bills referred to them are considered. The general committee on railway and canal bills may form into groups all bills which in their opinion it may be expedient to submit to the same committee, and shall report the same to the House (c). They are also required to name the bill or bills which shall be taken into consideration on the first day of the meeting of each committee on any group of such bills (d), and the committee on each group must take such bill or bills first into consideration, and from time to time appoint the day on which they will enter upon the consideration of the remaining bills. Two clear days' notice of such appointment is given by the committee clerk to the clerks in the Private Bill Office, and the like notice of any postponement (e). Order of proceeding in the committee-room.

One of the questions which was usually much discussed before committees, was the locus standi of each of the various parties who petitioned against the bill to be heard by counsel against the preamble (f). The decisions on this point were very variable, but now the Standing Orders lay down the following rules:— Proceedings before the committee in the Commons.

87. The Chairman of Ways and Means shall decide upon all petitions as to the rights of the petitioners to be heard upon such petitions, without prejudice however to the power of the select committee, to which the bill is referred, to decide upon any question as to such rights arising incidentally in the course of their proceedings. Chairman to decide as to rights of petitioners to be heard upon their petitions, &c.

125. It shall be competent to the Chairman of Ways and Means to admit petitioners to be heard upon their petitions against a private bill, on the ground of competition, if he shall think fit. Competition a ground of locus standi.

Romilly, M. R., said, "It was stated that if the application to Parliament were made by or in the name of the company, the plaintiff and other members of the company, alleging that they had an adverse interest, would not be allowed to appear in opposition to the bill. (Frere on Parliamentary Committees.) I own I have great difficulty in supposing that such is the course of proceeding in parliamentary committees; but it is said that some instances have occurred in which this has been done."

In what cases shareholders to be heard.

126. Where a bill is promoted by an incorporated company, shareholders of such company shall not be entitled to be heard before the committee against such bill, unless their interests, as affected thereby, shall be distinct from the general interests of such company (g).

In what cases railway companies to be heard.

127. Where a railway bill contains provisions for taking or using any part of the lands, railway, stations or accommodations of another company, or for running engines or carriages upon or across the same, or for granting other facilities, such company shall be entitled to be heard upon their petition against the preamble and clauses of such bill.

Municipal authorities and inhabitants of towns, &c.

128. It shall be competent to the Chairman of Ways and Means to admit petitioners, being the municipal or other authority having the local management of the metropolis or of any town, or the inhabitants of any town or district alleged to be injuriously affected by a bill, to be heard against such bill, if he shall think fit.

When opposed bills may be treated as unopposed.

129. In all cases of opposed private bills, in which no parties shall have appeared on the petitions against such bills, or having appeared shall have withdrawn their opposition before the evidence of the promoters shall have been commenced, the committees on such bills shall forthwith refer them back, with a statement of the facts, if railway and canal bills, to the general committee on railway and canal bills, who shall deal with them as unopposed bills.

Proceedings before the Committee in the Commons.

The committee having determined to proceed with one of the bills, the senior counsel for the bill opens the case, making particular reference to such provisions in the bill as are petitioned against; and, as the preamble to the bill is first considered, the observations are directed in support of the allegations contained in the preamble; but he is restricted to a statement of facts. Witnesses are also examined in support of the case which has been thus opened. This is also the period when evidence is adduced, to satisfy the committee, upon all the points upon which the committee are required to report specially to the House (h). The witnesses may be cross-examined by the counsel who appear in support of petitions against the preamble, but not by the counsel of parties who merely object to particular clauses in the bill (i). The witnesses may afterwards be re-examined in the usual manner; and when all the promoters' witnesses have been examined, then, if counsel are heard against the preamble, the senior counsel opens his case, and his witnesses are heard, cross-examined, and re-examined; and the counsel who appear for landowners, and other opponents, have the option of making their speeches either at the opening or close of their evidence. If the petitioner's counsel state facts, or call evidence, the counsel for the bill is entitled to a reply on the whole case; otherwise the counsel for the bill is not entitled to a general reply. He may, however, comment on any cases cited in the argument on the other side. The committee then proceed to affirm or deny that the preamble has been proved. If the decision is in the affirmative, they go through the bill, clause by clause, and fill up blanks, and parties who object to particular clauses or who propose amendments are heard. New clauses may also be proposed by the parties or members of the committee after all the clauses are gone through. It is at this time also that officers of public departments sometimes appear to secure the insertion of clauses protective of the property or interests of the Crown, or concerning the public interests (k). The committee may now also, as we have seen, refer questions in special cases to referees (l). The Standing Orders (m) point out the duties of the committee in recording their proceedings and reporting them to the House. When the committee have made their report, the report and the bill are by the Standing Orders ordered to lie upon the table (n). The bill must then be printed as amended in committee, and delivered to the doorkeepers for the use of members (o), to the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means and the Counsel to Mr. Speaker, and deposited at the office of the Board of Trade three clear days, at least, before the consideration of the bill (p). Three clear days must also intervene between the report and the consideration of the bill, and no consideration of the bill will take place unless the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means shall have informed the House or signified in writing to Mr. Speaker whether the bill contain the several provisions required by the Standing Orders (q). When it is proposed to bring up any clause or propose any amendment on the consideration of the bill, the same must be submitted by the agent to the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and the Counsel to Mr. Speaker, on the day on which notice is given thereof in the Private Bill Office (r), and the said chairman shall inform the House or signify in writing to Mr. Speaker whether such clause or amendment be such as ought or ought not to be entertained by the House, without referring the same to the Select Committee on Standing Orders (s).

whether the bill should be recommitted (u). But no further proceeding can be had until their report is brought up (x). If the bill is recommitted it is referred to the former committee, and three clear days' notice must be given by the agents to the clerks in the Private Bill Office of the day and hour appointed for the meeting of the committee (y), and a filled up bill as proposed to be submitted to the committee on recommitment must be deposited in the Private Bill Office two clear days before the meeting of the committee, and a copy of the proposed amendments shall be furnished by the promoters to such parties petitioning against the bill as shall apply for it one clear day before the meeting of the committee (z). Amendments made on the consideration of the bill are entered by one of the clerks in the Private Bill Office upon the printed copy of the bill as amended in committee, which clerk signs the copy so amended and preserves it in the office (a). The bill is then ordered to be read a third time, of which one clear day's notice must be given by the agent to the clerks in the Private Bill Office; but no such notice shall be given until the day after that on which the bill was ordered to be read a third time (b). After it is read a third time, it is printed fair (c), examined by the clerks in the Private Bill Office with the bill as read a third time, certified by them (d), and sent to the Lords.

2. Progress of the Bill through the Lords (e).

Before proceeding to trace the bill through the Lords, it is necessary to call attention to the following important orders:—

Moreover, a map or plan and section of the railway, showing any variation, extension or enlargement which is intended to be made in consequence of such alteration, must be deposited in the office of the Clerk of the Parliaments; and such map or plan and section must be on the same scale, and contain the same particulars, as the original plan and section (j). Bill to be submitted to a meeting of proprietors in incorporated companies in certain cases.

1. That the bill as proposed to be introduced into the Lords was submitted to a meeting of the proprietors of such company, at a meeting held specially for that purpose.
2. That such meeting was called by advertisement inserted for two consecutive weeks in a morning newspaper, published in London, Edinburgh or Dublin, as the case may be, and in a newspaper of the county or counties in which the principal office or offices of the company is or are situate; and also by a circular addressed to each proprietor at his last known or usual address, and sent by post, or delivered at such address not less than ten days before the holding of such meeting, inclosing a blank form of proxy, with proper instructions for the use of the same, and the same form of proxy and the same instructions, and none other, shall be sent to every such proprietor; but no such form of proxy shall be stamped, nor shall the funds of the company be used for the stamping any proxies, except the company shall at a general meeting determine otherwise, in which case a stamped proxy shall be sent to each proprietor, with such instructions as aforesaid.
3. That such meeting was held on a period not earlier than seven days after the last insertion of such advertisement.
4. That at such meeting the said bill was submitted to the proprietors aforesaid then present, and approved of (l) by proprietors, present in person or by proxy, holding at least three-fourths of the paid-up capital of the company represented at such meeting, such proprietors being qualified to vote at the meeting in right of such capital (m).

Consent of directors, &c., named in bill to be proved.

When the name of any person or persons is introduced into the bill, as manager, director, proprietor or otherwise concerned in carrying the bill into effect, proof will be required before the Examiner that such person or persons have subscribed their names to the petition for the bill or to a printed copy of the bill as brought up to the Lords (n).

Proof to be required before examiner of consent of proprietors of any company to sum authorized to be raised in aid of another company.

And when in the bill a provision is inserted authorizing the company to subscribe towards or to guarantee or to raise any money in aid of the undertaking of another company (which bill is not brought in by the company so authorized, or of which such company is not a joint promoter), proof will be required before the Examiner that the company so authorized has consented to such subscription, guarantee or raising of money at a meeting of the proprietors of the ordinary shares of such company held specially for that purpose in the same manner and subject to the same provisions as the meeting directed to be held under Standing Order clxxxv. 1; and that such consent was given by such proprietors, present in person or by proxy, holding at least three-fourths of the ordinary paid-up capital of the company represented at such meeting, such proprietors being qualified to vote at the meeting in right of such capital; and that the notices for the bill state the sum authorized to be subscribed, or guaranteed, or raised, and also state that the consent of the company has been given as aforesaid. In any case in which such consent has been given, it will not be necessary to submit the bill, in respect of such provision as aforesaid, to the approval of a meeting to be held in accordance with Standing Order clxxxv. 1 (o).

No petition necessary.

Let us now proceed to trace the bill through the House of Lords. It is not necessary to present to the House of Lords any petition for leave to bring in a railway bill sent up from the Commons (p).

By the practice of the House of Lords, copies of the bill as originally introduced, and also as proposed to be submitted to the committee on the bill in the Commons, are laid before the Chairman of the Lords' Committees and his Counsel, so that a simultaneous examination of the bill is proceeding in both Houses (q). This course enables the promoters to embody amendments suggested in the Lords before the bill has passed the Commons, and greatly facilitates the passage of the bill through the Lords.

(o) L. S. O. clxxxv. 3. This is the same as C. S. O. 67, except that that refers to bills sent from the Lords. C. S. O. 73, enables proprietors dissenting to be heard on memorial by the examiners on the compliance with Standing Orders, or by the committee on petition to the House.

When the bill is introduced into the Lords, it is read a first time, First reading. and not later than two days after the bill is read a first time, a copy of the bill as brought into the Lords must be deposited at the office of the Board of Trade. Proof of compliance with this order is given by depositing a certificate from the said Board in the Private Bill Office (r).

Every railway bill brought from the Commons is after the first reading referred to the Examiners, before whom compliance with such Standing Orders as have not been previously inquired into must be proved. The Examiner must give at least two clear days' notice of the day on which the bill will be examined. Memorials complaining of non-compliance with Standing Orders must be deposited in the office of the Clerk of the Parliaments, with two copies thereof, before noon of the day preceding that appointed for the examination of the bill (s). After first reading, referred to examiner.

The Examiner reports to the Standing Orders Committee, as to whether or not the Standing Orders have been complied with, and makes a special report if necessary (t). The Standing Orders Committee (which is appointed at the commencement of every Session, and consists of forty Lords, besides the Chairman of Committees, who is always Chairman of Standing Orders Committee, three of whom are a quorum) reports to the House whether the Standing Orders ought or ought not to be dispensed with, and in the case of a special report of the Examiner, whether or not they have been complied with, or whether they should be dispensed with (u).

No petition praying to be heard upon the merits against any railway bill will be received by the House, unless the same be presented on or before the fifth day on which the House shall sit after the day on which such bill has been read a first time (x). Petitions against bill.

The bill will not be read a second time before the fifth day on which the House shall sit after the day on which the bill was read a first time (y). Nor will it be read a second time until printed copies are left with the Clerk of the Parliaments for the perusal of the Lords, and one of the said copies must be delivered to every person concerned in the bill before the meeting of the committee on the bill, and in case of infancy must be delivered to the guardian or next relation of full age not concerned in interest or in the passing of the bill (z). Second reading.

The second reading, as in the Commons, affirms the principle of the bill, subject to proof of the preamble before the committee, and is immediately followed by the commitment (a). If opposed, it is Commitment.

referred to a select committee of five Lords. The proceedings before the committee are similar to those adopted in the Commons (b).

Duties of committee.

In addition to the general inquiries before the committee, they are ordered to observe that particular provisions are inserted for restricting loans or mortgages, for maintaining the levels of roads, and for restraining the crossing of roads on a level. They are also required to observe the same rules and introduce the same clauses and provisions as in the Commons, relative to the non-payment of interest on calls or deposits out of capital, and the financial arrangements of companies in cases of purchase and amalgamation (c). These provisions, however, being included in the bill as brought from the Commons (d), need not be further noticed here. It is also required that in every railway bill there be inserted a clause to enact:—

That the directors appointed by this act shall continue in office until the first ordinary meeting to be held after the passing of the act, and at such meeting the shareholders present, personally or by proxy, may either continue in office the directors appointed by this act, or any number of them, or may elect a new body of directors or directors to supply the places of those not continued in office, the directors appointed by this act being eligible as members of such new body (e).

If any report made under the authority of the Commissioners of Railways upon the bill or the objects thereof is laid before the House, such report is referred to the committee on the bill (f).

Amendments in committee.

If any amendments have been made in committee, the bill must be reprinted as amended previously to the third reading, unless the Chairman of the Committee certify that the reprinting is unnecessary (g); and a copy of the bill as amended must be deposited in the office of the Board of Trade three days before the third reading. Proof of compliance with this order is given by depositing a certificate from the said Board in the Private Bill Office (h). No amendment can be moved on the report or on the third reading, unless the same has been submitted to the Chairman of Committees, and printed copies thereof deposited with the Clerk of the Parliaments, one clear day at least prior to the report or third reading (i).

3. On the Taxation of Costs incurred in Parliament (k).

Having thus traced the progress of a bill through Parliament, the present seems to be a fitting place to remark that the bills of costs of Parliamentary agents, attornies, solicitors and others, in respect of railway bills, and expenses incurred in complying with the Standing Orders in Parliament, and in preparing, bringing in, and carrying such bills through, or in opposing the same, in either House of Parliament, are subject to certain statutory regulations. The stat. 10 & 11 Vict. c. 69(l), regulates the taxation of such bills in the House of Commons, and the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 78(m), in the House of Lords. The following is a brief summary of the contents of these statutes, which repealed the former statutes relating to the taxation of costs in Parliament(n). Costs incurred in the House of Commons(o) or the House of Lords(p), cannot be recovered by action, until one month after a signed bill of costs has been sent or delivered to the party charged. But a judge may dispense with such month's notice, upon proof that the party charged is about to quit the United Kingdom. The Speaker of the House of Commons(q), and the Clerk of the Parliaments, or in his absence the Clerk Assistant of the House of Lords(r), appoint the taxing officers in the respective Houses(s).

Bill for costs incurred in parliamentary proceedings are subject to taxation.

The Speaker of the House of Commons(t), and the Clerk of the Parliaments, or his assistant, in the House of Lords(u), may from time to time prepare lists of charges to be allowed upon taxation of bills of costs in their respective Houses(x), and the taxing officer may exa-

Costs incurred in Parliamentary Proceedings.*

Upon the application of any party, upon whom a demand of Parliamentary costs, incurred in the Commons (z), or in the Lords (a), has been made, or upon the application of the party sending in such demand of costs, the taxing officers, upon receiving a true copy of the bill, which shall have been duly delivered as aforesaid, shall proceed to tax and settle the same, and in the absence of either party they may proceed ex parte; and actions brought to recover the bill pending the taxation shall be stayed until the amount of the bill has been duly certified by the Speaker, or Clerk of the Parliaments, or Clerk's Assistant. But no application to tax can be entertained by the taxing officers, after a verdict has been obtained for the recovery of the bill of costs, or after the expiration of six months after the bill shall have been delivered: although in the latter case, upon a report of special circumstances, the taxing officer may be directed to tax the bill.

The taxing officer, on the direction of either party, is required to report to the Speaker of the Commons (b), or to the Clerk of the Parliaments, or his assistant, in the House of Lords (c), respecting the amount of the taxation and the costs thereof, and within twenty-one days either party may complain of the report, and the Speaker, or Clerk of the Parliaments, or his assistant, as the case may be, may require a further report from the taxing officer: and when the matters have been finally disposed of, a certificate is issued of the amount ascertained to be due, which is binding and conclusive on the parties, in all proceedings at law or in equity, or otherwise; and in any action or other proceeding brought for the recovery of the amount so certified, the certificate shall have the effect of a warrant of attorney to confess judgment; but it is provided that if the defendant in any action shall have pleaded that he is not liable to the payment of the

If any bill of costs in either House of Parliament comprises any charges incurred in respect of a private bill, but not taxable by the act, in pursuance whereof such bill may come to be taxed, the taxing officer of the House of Lords, or of the House of Commons, as the case may be, may tax such costs himself, or request the taxing officer of the other House of Parliament, or the proper officer of any other court, to assist him in taxing any part of such bill; and the officer so requested to tax has the same power, and may receive the same fees, as upon a reference from the court of which he is such officer, and the report and certificate shall include the amount of such last-mentioned fees and expenses (e). the Schedule of Fees, from a conviction that it is desirable that it should be considered in conjunction with the scale of other Parliamentary charges, regulated under 10 & 11 Vict. c. 69, which latter did not come within the scope of the enquiry delegated to the committee. But they were strongly of opinion, that a reduction in some of the fees of the House and other charges paid in respect of private bills might be made, and should take effect as early as possible. They have been subsequently reduced, ante, p. 35. As to the other charges, see ante, p. 35, note (t).

1. Introductory Remarks.

THE railways established in this kingdom are, for many purposes, public highways, like the ancient roads which they have almost superseded (a). Their origin is, however, different, for these modern roads have been formed by private enterprise alone (b), and their management is entrusted, by the legislature, to joint-stock companies, whose powers are derived from Acts of Parliament, obtained, as we have seen, for the purpose of establishing each particular line of railway (c). When the earliest railways were made, each Act was, like the old turnpike special acts, complete in itself, and contained the necessary

(b) But by 12 & 13 Vict. c. 62, half a million sterling was advanced by way of loan out of the consolidated fund to make the Midland Great Western Railway in Ireland.

(c) It appears by a return made to the House of Commons in July, 1862, by the several railway companies in England and Wales, Scotland and Ireland, that the total amount raised by shares and loans on 31st December, 1861, was the enormous sum of 362,327,338*l.*, or nearly half the amount of the national debt, and this exclusively of seventeen railway companies who had made no return. The number of miles open was 10,869½, so that the cost per mile was about 33,332*l.* Twenty years before, viz., in 1842, there were only 1,510 miles open. By the same return it appears that the following were the total traffic receipts for one year, ending 31st December, 1861:—

England and Wales—		£
Goods	12,775,456
Passengers	11,246,472

Ireland—
Goods	540,111
Passengers	907,882
	1,447,993

The gross traffic receipts for the United Kingdom for the week ending 1st October, 1864, amounted to 700,645*l.*, on 11,586 miles of railway.

powers for making, maintaining and managing the particular railway. It was afterwards thought desirable that one code should, as far as it was practicable, be applicable to all such undertakings; and this was carried into effect by certain Acts of Parliament passed in 1845; and, as many of the earlier companies have been brought under this code, upon their subsequent applications for further powers from parliament, it may be said that the greater number of existing companies are subject to the provisions contained in these acts. They are three in number,—The Companies Clauses Consolidation Act; The Lands Clauses Consolidation Act; and the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act. Besides these Acts of Parliament, two additional acts of a similar nature were passed in 1863, called “The Companies Clauses Act, 1863,” and “The Railways Clauses Act, 1863.” As the titles of these various acts indicate, they relate to three principal objects (d);—1. The constitution of Railway Companies, and their powers. 2. The rights of shareholders and others, who invest the necessary capital, and thus enable the directors to carry on the business of the company. 3. The powers of the company—to take and purchase lands for the purpose of constructing the railway, and works connected therewith. It is, therefore, proposed to treat, in order, on these three subjects, reserving for separate consideration any other branches of our inquiry which may be deserving of notice.

But before we proceed with this investigation, it may be useful to give a summary of the contents of a Railway Act, as it is usually framed since the Consolidation Acts have come into operation.

Each particular railway act is called “the special act” (e). The special act, after reciting in the preamble, that the formation of the proposed railway would be of great public advantage, proceeds to incorporate the three Consolidation Acts of 1845 before referred to, save as to such parts thereof as may be modified by, or be inconsistent with, the provisions of the special act. The subscribers are then incorporated, by name, as a body corporate (f), with perpetual succession, with power to purchase and hold lands, within the restrictions therein and in the Consolidation Acts contained. The amount of the capital to be raised is then declared, and the mode of making the calls is prescribed. It is also provided that no shareholder of the company shall be liable for, or charged with, the payment of any debt or demand due from the company beyond the extent of his share in the capital of the company not then paid up; and limited powers are given to raise money on mortgage or on bond, provided a certain specified amount of the capital be subscribed and paid up (g). The number of directors is prescribed, and sometimes a power of removal for misconduct is given. The company are empowered, by exercising the powers in the statute, to make and maintain the railway and works, on the lands delineated and described in the parliamentary plans and book of reference, and the line of the railway is pointed out. Any special provisions are then inserted. The quantity of land which may be taken for extraordinary purposes is defined, and also the period within which lands are to be purchased, and a certain time is prescribed for the completion of the railway. The tolls which may be taken are also particularly specified, and a maximum rate of charges, for passengers and goods, is inserted. A power enabling the company to lease or sell the railway is sometimes added; and it is specially provided, that the provisions of all existing or future general railway acts shall be in force in respect to the railway and company.

(d) The two first-named statutes are applicable to companies established for other public undertakings as well as railways. The 8 & 9 Vict. c. 17, is the Companies Clauses Act, and the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 19, the Lands Clauses Act, for Scotland.

Usual Provisions in a Special Railway Act.

As soon as the special act is obtained, all the powers which the railway company previously enjoyed, by reason of registration, cease and determine, except so far as may be otherwise provided by the special act; and the money deposited in the Bank of England, in pursuance of the Standing Orders in Parliament (h), may now be withdrawn, on the petition of the parties in whose name the money is standing (i), subject, nevertheless, to the provisions contained in Standing Order No. 150, which, it will be observed, applies to Ireland as well as to the United Kingdom (j).

2. Meetings of Shareholders.

We shall presently see that the management and superintendence of the affairs of a railway company are intrusted to a board of directors; but as these officers are always elected by a vote of the shareholders, who may also, by holding an extraordinary meeting, control

In the session 1853, the following order was made in the Commons, "That all railway bills introduced into this House during the present session, as a general rule, be made integral in themselves, and that the greatest caution be exercised in admitting into them, otherwise than by specific enactment, provisions which repeal, continue, or extend the powers of former acts; and that the attention of committees on private bills be directed to this point."

and regulate their proceedings, we shall first consider the mode in which the meetings of shareholders are required to be held.

The Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, which is printed at length in the Appendix, provides that two meetings of shareholders, called "ordinary meetings," shall be held every year: (Sect. 66 (k).) And no matters, except such as are appointed to be done at an ordinary meeting, shall be transacted, unless special notice of such matters have been given in the advertisement convening such meeting: (Sect. 67.) Every general meeting of shareholders other than an ordinary meeting, is called "an extraordinary meeting," and may be convened by the directors as they think fit: (Sect. 68.) But only such business as was mentioned in the notice which convened the meeting can be entered upon: (Sect. 69.) A certain number of shareholders (l) may also require an extraordinary meeting to be held, by sending a requisition to the directors, who are thereupon required to convene the meeting; or on their default, the requisitionists may call such meeting: (Sect. 70.) Fourteen days' (m) public notice, at the least, of all meetings, ordinary and extraordinary, must be given in the form prescribed; and every notice of an extraordinary meeting, or of certain ordinary meetings particularly mentioned, must specify the purpose for which such meeting is called (n): (Sect. 71.) All notices required by that or the special act to be given by advertisement shall be advertised in the prescribed newspaper, or, if no newspaper be prescribed, or if the prescribed newspaper cease to be published, in a newspaper circulating in the district within which the company's principal place of business shall be situated (o): (Sect. 138.) (k) The Consolidation Acts, which form the basis of this and following chapters of this work, are necessarily abbreviated, and much labour has been devoted to the preparation of an accurate analysis of their contents. But, reminding readers of Lord Coke's maxim, "Melius est petere fontes quam sectari rivulos,"—the author has in every case given a reference to the statute itself, which is to be found in the Appendix.

(l) If, from any circumstances, an exact compliance with the terms of the statute is impossible, it seems that these and similar provisions will be considered as directory only, see Foss v. Harbottle, 2 Hare, 496. It has been decided under the Benefit Building Society Act (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32), that a meeting may be both general and special;—general for the purpose of doing general business, and special for a particular purpose. Cutbill v. Kingdom, 1 Exch. 504.

The "Sun" newspaper did not circulate in Swansea, nor was any copy of the third edition sent there, and it was decided that the meeting held in pursuance of the advertisement was invalid. *Swansea Dock Co. v. tute a meeting (whether ordinary or extraordinary) there must be present, personally or by proxy, the prescribed quorum; and if no quorum be prescribed in the special act, then shareholders holding, in the aggregate, not less than one-twentieth of the capital of the company, and being in number not less than one for every five hundred pounds of such required proportion of capital, unless such number would be more than twenty, in which case twenty shareholders, holding not less than one-twentieth of the capital of the company, shall be the quorum. And if, within one hour, the quorum be not present, no business, except declaring a dividend, can be transacted, and such meeting must (except it be to appoint directors) be held to be adjourned sine die: (Sect. 72.) The act provides for the appointment of the chairman at all meetings: (Sect. 73.) The shareholders at any meeting can proceed only with respect to the matters for which the meeting was convened, and such meeting may be adjourned: (Sect. 74.)

Meetings of shareholders, ordinary and extraordinary.

At all general meetings, every shareholder may vote according to the prescribed scale of voting; and if no scale shall be prescribed by the special act, every shareholder has one vote for every share up to ten, and an additional vote for every five shares, beyond the first ten shares, and an additional vote for every ten shares held by him, beyond the first hundred shares, if he has paid up all calls on the shares held by him: (Sect. 75.) Votes may be given personally, or by proxies, being shareholders, and a form of proxy is given in the act (p). The chairman of the meeting has a casting-vote, if there be an equality of votes: (Sect. 76.) Instruments (q) appointing a proxy other instrument in the nature thereof, for the sole purpose of appointing, nominating or authorizing any person to vote as a proxy, or otherwise at one meeting of the proprietors or shareholders of any joint-stock or other company, or of the members of any society or institution, or of the contributors to the funds thereof, or at one meeting of any body exercising a public trust in the United Kingdom: 1d. Voting Paper,—that is to say, any instrument for the purpose of voting by any person entitled to vote at any such meeting as aforesaid in any part of the United Kingdom: 1d. must be transmitted to the secretary before the prescribed period, and, if no period be prescribed, forty-eight hours before the meeting is held: (8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, s. 77.) The committee of lunatics and the guardians of minors may vote: (Sect. 79.) Whenever a particular majority of votes is required, such majority need only be proved in the event of a poll: in other cases a declaration of the chairman and an entry made in the book of proceedings is sufficient: (Sect. 80.)

We now proceed to show how the Board of Directors is constituted.

3. The Appointment of Directors, and their Meetings.

The appointment of directors.

The special act always names the first Board of Directors, and prescribes the number which shall be from time to time appointed by the shareholders: and sometimes the shareholders are authorized to increase or reduce the number of directors. The Companies Clauses Consolidation Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, which is printed at length in the Appendix) contains the following provisions as to the appointment of directors.

The number must be the prescribed number: (Sect. 81.) But they may be increased or reduced, at a general meeting of the company, if the special act authorizes such a proceeding: (Sect. 82.) The directors appointed by the special act (unless thereby otherwise the commissioners to stamp after the signing thereof by any person, any vellum or paper upon which any letter or power of attorney, or other instrument appointing or nominating a proxy chargeable with duty under this act, shall be ingrossed, written, or printed; and if any person shall make or sign any such letter or power of attorney, or other instrument as aforesaid, which shall be ingrossed, written or printed, or partly ingrossed or written and partly printed, upon vellum, parchment, or paper not duly stamped according to law, or if any person shall vote or attempt to vote, or act as a proxy in pursuance or under the authority or pretended authority of any such letter or power of attorney, or other instrument, not duly stamped as aforesaid, every person so offending in any or either of the cases aforesaid shall forfeit and pay the sum of 50*l.*; and every vote made or given, or other act done in pursuance, or under the authority, or pretended authority, of any such letter or power of attorney, or other instrument not duly stamped as aforesaid, shall be absolutely null and void to all intents and purposes.

By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 91, s. 27, it is provided that the stamp on a proxy "may be denoted by an adhesive stamp to be provided by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, and affixed to the instrument and cancelled by the person signing the instrument, by writing his name or the initials thereof upon or across the stamp, together with the date of the day of the meeting for voting at which the instrument is made; but nothing herein contained shall relieve any person from the penalty incurred by making or signing any such instrument on paper not duly stamped, or by voting or attempting to vote under the authority thereof, unless there shall be affixed thereto and cancelled as aforesaid the proper adhesive stamp." And there is a similar provision with regard to voting papers. 27 & 28 Vict. c. 18, s. 14.

A general proxy to vote at all meetings would not be valid. In Trinity House of Hull v. Beedle, 13 Q. B. 175; 18 Law J. (Q. B.) 78, a general proxy was held to be valid when stamped with a 3*s.* stamp (see Tilsley on the Stamp Act, 60); but the statute, in that case, contained an express authority to vote, by proxy, "at all meetings" of the company.

provided) continue in office until the first ordinary meeting in the year next after the special act shall be passed: at that meeting the shareholders elect the directors, the directors appointed by the special act being eligible to be re-appointed. At the first ordinary meeting, held every year afterwards, the places of retiring directors are in like manner supplied: (Sect. 83 (r).) If, at any meeting for the election of directors, the prescribed quorum of shareholders be not present, the meeting stands adjourned to the following day; and if, at the adjourned meeting, such prescribed quorum be not present, the existing directors continue in office till the first ordinary meeting of the following year: (Sect. 84.) A director must be a shareholder, and hold the prescribed number (if any) of shares; and he may not hold or accept any office or place of trust or profit under the company, or be interested in any contract(s): (Sect. 85.) If he does, or if, in any manner, he participates in the profits of any work to be done for the company, or ceases to hold shares in the company (t), he ceases to be a director, and his place is declared vacant: (Sect. 86.) But the disqualification as to contracts does not extend to contracts made with an incorporated joint-stock company, of which the director is a member; nevertheless such director cannot vote on any question of contract with such joint-stock company: (Sect. 87.) The directors retire from office at the times and in the proportions prescribed in the special act: and if no number be prescribed, one-third at the end of the first year, one other third the second year, and the remaining third the third year, the rotation being determined by ballot: but retiring directors are eligible to be re-elected: (Sect. 88.) If a director dies, resigns, becomes dis-

Mode of voting

of directors.

(r) The proper mode of voting seems to be, that every shareholder should vote for a list of the whole number of persons he intends to vote for—not exceeding of course the number to be elected. It has been decided that when a certain number of persons are to be elected as an official body, this principle is the only one that can be reasonably acted upon. The point on which the voter exercises his judgment is not whether A. would be a good director to fill one of the vacancies, but whether A. and others would form a good board. See R. v. Brightwell, 10 A. & E. 171. The right to demand a poll is by the common law an incident to the popular election of a person to an office, Campbell v. Maund, 5 A. & E. 880; and the poll must be kept open a reasonable time. In 8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, s. 80, it is assumed that this common law right may be exercised, and see post, 47, note (c). See also R. v. Hillingdon, 18 Q. B. 718.

(s) If a director contravenes this provision, the contract is not thereby annulled, but the office of director is vacated. Foster v. Oxford R. Co., Weekly Reporter, 1852-3, p. 151; 17 Jur. 167; 22 L. J. (C. P.) 99; 13 C. B. 200. See also Aberdeen R. Co. v. Blakie, 23 Law Times, 315. The section applies only to contracts made with the company in the execution of its enterprise. Sheffield and Manchester R. Co. v. Woodcock, 7 Mee. & W. 574, where it was held, that directors, who were members of a banking company, might act as bankers to the company.

(t) Bankrupts and insolvents are therefore disqualified, if the assignees elect to take the shares, Phelps v. Lyle, 10 A. & E. 113; but otherwise not, South Staffordshire R. Co. v. Burnside, 5 Exch. 129. See also Wylam's Steam Fuel Co. v. Strut, 10 Exch. 849, and Graham v. Van Diemen's Land Co., 26 L. J. (Exch.) 73. It seems that if a shareholder makes an equitable mortgage of his shares, that does not disqualify him. Per Lord Abinger, C. B., in Cumming v. Prescott, 3 Y. & Col. 488.

qualified or incompetent (u), or ceases to be a director by any other cause than by going out by rotation, the remaining directors may elect a shareholder to supply his place: (8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, s. 89.)

direction.

If the shareholders neglect to elect the full number of directors, which the special act requires to manage the affairs of the company, it seems that a mandamus would lie to compel an election (x); but, with respect to the occasional vacancies occasioned by any other cause than by going out of office by rotation, it is in the option of the remaining directors, whether they will fill up such vacancies or not. Where a railway act provided that the business of the company should be carried on under the management of twelve directors, to be chosen from among the proprietors holding ten shares each; and that, when and so often as any director should die or resign, or become disqualified or incompetent to act as a director, it should be lawful for the remaining directors to elect some other proprietor duly qualified in his place: the Court of Common Pleas decided that the act of Parliament did not require that there should be always twelve directors of the company, and that the power of re-election, given in cases of death or other disqualification, was not compulsory upon the remaining directors. If the directors were of opinion that their number was not sufficient to enable them to carry on the affairs of the company, they might elect others; but upon this point they were entitled to exercise an option (y). All acts done by a director, notwithstanding it was afterwards discovered that there was some defect in the appointment, or that he was disqualified, are declared to be as valid as if he had been duly appointed and qualified (8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, s. 99).

On the trial of actions to recover calls on shares, it is expressly provided, that it shall not be necessary to prove the appointment of the directors who made the call (sect. 27); and this also excludes a defendant from objecting to the authority of directors to institute proceedings, by making a summary application to the court in which the action is brought (z). It has also been decided, that, if there be a body of directors acting de facto, their acts may be valid, although the persons acting may not have been duly qualified (a). If a body of persons assume to act as directors without authority, the proper remedy seems to be to apply to the Court of Queen's Bench for a quo (u) It seems that a director may become incompetent by misconduct, as by absconding from his creditors. Wilson v. Wilson, 6 Scott, 340. When a court of equity will review the decision of a body of shareholders, who have decided on a question, as to the incompetency of one of its officers, see *Inderwick v. warranto. In a case of this kind, Lord Cottenham, C., declined to interfere, on the ground that it involved matters purely of law (b).

Vacancies in the direction.

The directors hold meetings as they shall appoint, and any two directors may call a meeting (c); and to constitute a meeting, a quorum must be present, consisting, if not otherwise prescribed in the special act, of one-third of the directors (d); and questions are decided by a majority of votes, and the chairman is entitled to a casting vote: (8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, s. 92.) A chairman and deputy chairman of directors may be elected annually; and any vacancy happening during the year must be filled up: (Sect. 93.) In the absence of both, at a meeting of directors, a temporary chairman is to be chosen: (Sect. 94.) The directors may appoint one or more committees, and entrust them with power to do acts relating to the affairs of the company, which the directors could lawfully do, and which they shall think proper to entrust to them (e): (Sect. 95.) The committees must exercise their powers at a meeting, at which a quorum must be present, and their chairman has a casting-vote: (Sect. 96.)

Appointment of committees.

(b) Mozley v. Alston, 1 Phil. 790; 16 Law J. (Chan.) 217.

(c) Where a body of persons are charged with the performance of any specified duties, it is not lawful to hold a meeting, unless due legal notice thereof be given to each of the members. It seems therefore to be important that every meeting of directors should be duly convened; otherwise their proceedings may be questioned. See the concluding part of section 98, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, post, Appendix. In Roberts v. Price, 4 C. B. 231, the election of a treasurer to a friendly society, vested in a committee of eleven persons, was held to be void, in consequence of an omission to give notice of the meeting to one of the committee, although the absent committeeman had for a considerable period ceased to attend the meetings, and had previously intimated an intention not to attend any more. In Smyth v. Darley, 2 H. L. C. 803, where the question was, if it was necessary that the Recorder of Dublin should have been summoned to the election of a freeman to the corporation—the rule is thus laid down: “The election being by a definite body on a day of which, till summons, the electors had no notice, they were all entitled to be specially summoned, and, if there was any omission to summon any of them, unless they all happened to be present, or unless those not summoned were beyond summoning distance, as for instance abroad, there could not be a good electoral assembly; and even an unanimous election by those who did attend would be void.” So in a case where certain directors nominated by a class of shareholders in the company, had been excluded at a meeting of the board, and it was contended at the bar, that that course of proceeding was strictly within the letter of the law, Sir J. Parker, V.C., said, “I am certainly surprised to hear that stated, because, upon every principle, not only governing bodies of the kind, but governing private partnerships, where there is a body of persons in which the majority is to bind the minority, it is essential to the validity of all their acts, that the voice of the minority should be heard; that the minority should have an opportunity of stating their view; and it is not till they have had that opportunity, that the acts of the majority become binding on the minority; and I think Lord Eldon’s opinion may be referred to, as showing that even if the minority had a voice given to them, if there had been a combination among the majority, before that voice was received to overbear it, he should consider the acts of such a body illegal; and upon the principles of this Court I think that would be so.” Great Western R. Co. v. Rushout, 16 Jur. 238; 5 De G. & S. 290. See also on this subject R. v. Langhorne, 4 A. & E. 538; S. C. 6 N. & M. 203. Whether notice of an adjourned meeting is necessary, see *Wills v. 4. The Power of Directors to enter into Contracts.

Application of funds.

We shall now point out the sections of the Companies Clauses Act which authorize the directors of a railway company to manage its important concerns. We shall find that, unless controlled by the shareholders, by a vote at a general meeting, their authority, provided it is exercised in cases within the powers of the company, is of the most extensive character. The Companies Clauses Consolidation Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, which is printed at length in the Appendix) enacts, that the money to be raised by subscriptions, loans, or otherwise, must be applied, first, in paying the costs of the special act (f); secondly, in carrying the purposes of the company into execution: (Sect. 65.) The directors shall have the management and superintendence of the affairs of the company, and they may lawfully exercise all the powers of the company (g), except as to such matters as are directed by that or the special act to be transacted by a general meeting of the company, but all the powers so to be exercised shall be exercised in accordance with and subject to the provisions of that and the special act; and the exercise of all such powers shall be subject also to the control and regulation of any general meeting specially convened for the purpose, but not so as to render invalid

(f) These may be recovered in an action of debt. Hitchins v. Kilkenny and Great Southern and Western R. Co., 9 C. B. 536. Where six railways, parts of a system, were projected by the same person, and an act of parliament was obtained authorizing the construction of two only, the rest being abandoned, and the special act provided that the costs and charges of obtaining and passing the act, and incidental and preparatory thereto, should be paid by the company, it was held that the costs incurred in relation to the abandoned railways were to be regarded as costs incidental and preparatory to the obtaining of the act, and were payable by the company. Re Tilleard, 32 L. J. (Ch.) 765; 8 Law T. (N. S.) 587.

(g) In ordinary partnerships the act of one partner is the act of all. Porthouse v. Parker, 1 Camp. 82; Jacaud v. French, 12 East, 317. But this principle is not applicable to promoters of a company; Hamilton v. Smith, 28 L. J. (Ch.) 404, ante, p. 2, note (e); nor to an incorporated company, like a railway company, which cannot be affected by what may be done or known by any individual shareholder. In Burnes v. Pennell, 2 H. L. C. 521, Lord Campbell says on this subject, "The doctrine contended for would lead to the conclusion that a joint-stock company is liable on any contract entered into by any shareholder within the scope of the business for carrying on which the company is established; and that any contract, regularly entered into with the directors, may be vitiated by anything said or done by any shareholder, without the authority or privity of the directors. Considering the important transactions now carried on through the medium of joint-stock companies, the doctrine is very alarming; but it rests on no principle, and no authority has been cited to support it." Neither will representations made by a law agent as to its commercial affairs bind the company.—Ibid. But it is a different question whether notice given to one member of a board of directors, may not bind the whole body of directors. See on this point Powles v. Page, 3 C. B. 16; also Burnes v. Pennell, supra—where Lord Campbell says, "We now come to the allegations respecting the acts of the directors themselves; and if the plaintiff has been deceived and defrauded by them, and induced by them to purchase the shares by their false representations, the interlocutor must be reversed. I do not think it necessary even that the representations should have been made personally to him. If the directors have made false representations, for the purpose of fictitiously enhancing the price of shares for their own benefit, and the appellant has thereby been deceived, and induced to purchase shares greatly beyond their value, the transfer of the shares, although executed, ought to be set aside. But the transfer having been executed, a clear and strong case of fraud ought to be established, and it must be shown that the purchaser of these shares was induced to purchase them by the deceit of the director."

any act done by the directors prior to any resolution passed by such general meeting: (Sect. 90.) The powers of directors.

The powers above referred to, which can be exercised only at a general meeting, are the choice and removal of the directors, except as hereinbefore mentioned, and the increasing or reducing of their number where authorized by the special act; the choice of auditors; the determination as to the remuneration of the directors, auditors, treasurers, and secretary (h); the determination as to the amount of money to be borrowed on mortgage; the determination as to the augmentation of capital, and the declaration of dividends: (Sect. 91.) In addition to the matters above enumerated, the special acts sometimes impose further limitations on the powers which the directors may exercise (i).

No director, by being party to or executing, in his capacity of director, any contract or instrument on behalf of the company, or otherwise lawfully executing any of the powers given to directors, shall be subject to be sued, either individually or collectively, by any person whomsoever; and the bodies or goods or lands of the directors shall not be liable to execution of any legal process, by reason of any contract or other instrument so entered into, signed, or executed by them, or by reason of any other lawful act done by them in the execution of any of their powers as directors; and the directors, their heirs, executors and administrators, shall be indemnified, out of the capital of the company, for all payments made or liability incurred in respect of any acts done by them, and for all losses, costs and damages which they may incur in the execution of the powers granted to them; and the directors for the time being of the company may apply the existing funds and capital of the company for the purposes of such indemnity, and may, if necessary for that purpose, make calls of the capital remaining unpaid (if any): (Sect. 100.) Directors not personally liable for contracts.

The power which may be granted to any committee to make contracts, as well as the power of the directors to make contracts on behalf of the company, may lawfully be exercised as follows:— Modes in which contracts may be made.
With respect to any contract which, if made between private persons, would be by law required to be in writing, and under seal, such committee, or the directors, may make such contract on behalf of the (h) But it is no answer to an action by a secretary for his salary, that no determination as to such salary has been exercised at a general meeting of the company. *Bill v. Darent Valley R. company, in writing, and under the common seal of the company, and in the same manner may vary or discharge the same.

With respect to any contract which, if made between private persons, would be by law required to be in writing, and signed by the parties to be charged therewith, then such committee, or the directors, may make such contract on behalf of the company in writing, signed by such committee or any two of them, or any two of the directors(k), and in the same manner may vary or discharge the same(l).

With respect to any contract which, if made between private persons, would by law be valid, although made by parol only, and not reduced into writing, such committee, or the directors, may make such contract on behalf of the company, by parol only, without writing, and in the same manner may vary or discharge the same(m).

And all such contracts are declared to be effectual in law, and to be binding upon the company and their successors, and all other parties thereto, their heirs, executors, or administrators; and on any default in the execution of any such contract, either by the company, or any other party thereto, such actions or suits may be brought, either by or against the company, as might be brought, had the same contracts been made between private persons only: (Sect. 97)(n).

(k) Where an agreement was not so signed, specific performance was refused in equity. Leominster Canal Navigation Co. v. Shrewsbury and Hereford R. Co., 26 L. J. (Ch.) 764.

(l) It will be prudent for directors to see that all contracts are carefully drawn. In Dewers v. Pike, Mur. & Hurl. 131, the defendant, a director of the West Cork Mining Company, ordered goods of the plaintiffs, and signed his name "P., director of W. C. M. Company," intimating at the time that the goods were for the company. The company were incorporated by act of Parliament, and in the act was a clause enabling the company to sue and be sued in respect of contracts made by any individual director on behalf of the company. It was decided that the defendant was liable in his private capacity; and per Parke, B., "I dare say the defendant intended to act on behalf of the company. He ought, however, to have used clear words; no doubt the plaintiffs had an option to sue him." So in Healey v. Story, 3 Exch. 3, where defendants, directors of a joint-stock newspaper company, gave a promissory note as follows: "On demand, we jointly and severally promise to pay to Mr. L. H. or order, the sum of 250*l.* value received, for and on behalf of the Wesleyan Newspaper Association," which was signed by the defendants as "directors," the court held that the words "jointly and severally" are equivalent to jointly and personally; and that the defendants were personally liable. (m) See Eales v. Cumberland Black Lead Mining Co., 30 Law J. (Exch.) 141. L. and N. W. R. Co.*, 8 Exch. 867.

(n) The rule of the common law is, that a corporation, being an invisible body, cannot manifest its intentions by any personal act or oral discourse; and it therefore acts and speaks only by its common seal. For, though the particular members may express their private consents to any act, by words or signing their names, yet this does not bind the corporation; it is the fixing of the seal, and that only, which unites the several assents of the individuals who compose the community, and makes one joint assent of the whole. See Dav. 44, 48. In pursuance of this doctrine, all contracts made by corporations are required to be under their common seal, subject to certain exceptions, in favour of trading and other contracts. See Beverley v. Lincoln Gas Light Co., 6 Ad. & E. 829; Fishmongers' Co. v. Robertson, 5 M. & G. 131; Paine v. Strand Union, 8 Q. B.

326. These excepted cases depend upon very subtle distinctions; and the above enactment seemed likely to prevent many difficulties, which would otherwise have arisen, in enforcing contracts made by railway directors. But notwithstanding the general terms of the 97th section, some very important questions have arisen as to the validity of contracts not made strictly according to its provisions. In Homersham v. Wolverhampton Waterworks Co., 6 Exch. 137; 20 Law J. (Exch.) 193; the Court of Exchequer expressed an opinion that a company cannot contract except in pursuance of the provisions of the 97th section; and the 98th section, which requires that a note of all contracts should be entered in a book, was referred to, for the purpose of showing that a contract to be implied by an acceptance of goods or services, could not arise in any case,—and it was accordingly determined that an engineer, who had entered into a contract to perform certain works for the company under seal, could not recover a sum of money which he charged for extra works, although all these extra works were done with the approval of the engineer to the company. The court seemed to be of opinion that the mere fact of the work being done and accepted, was not sufficient to charge the company, in the absence of proof of any order from the directors. Lamprell v. Billericay Union, 3 Exch. 283; 18 Law J. (Exch.) 282; Cope v. Thames Haven Co., 3 Exch. 841; 18 Law J. (Exch.) 345; Diggle v. London and Blackwall R. Co., 5 Exch. 442; 19 Law J. (Exch.) 308; are also authorities to the like effect. But the ruling of the Court of Exchequer, in these cases, has not been followed in the other courts, and, although without reference to the above section, another and more satisfactory rule seems to be laid down, i. e., that whenever a corporation is created for particular purposes, which involve the necessity for frequently entering into contracts for goods or works, essentially necessary for carrying the purposes for which the corporation is created into execution, a demand in respect of goods or works which have actually been supplied to and accepted by the corporation, and of which they have had the full benefit, may be enforced by action,—although the contract was not entered into in conformity with the strict rules of law. Thus in Sanders v. Guardians of St. Neot's Union, 8 Q. B. 810, the defendants, a corporation, gave a verbal order for some iron gates, and the objection that there was no contract under seal was denied them, inasmuch as the work was completed, and adopted by them for purposes connected with the corporation. So in Beverley v. Lincoln Gas Light Co., 6 A. & E. 829, a corporation was held liable to be sued in assumpsit for gas meters supplied upon an order given by one of the members of the corporation. So Lord Campbell, C. J., in Governor of Copper Miners v. Fox, 16 Q. B. 229; 20 Law J. (Q. B.) 174, observes—"Had the subject-matter of this contract been copper, or if it had been shown in any way to be incidental or ancillary to carrying on the business of copper miners, the contract would have been binding, although not under seal; for where a trading company is created by charter, while acting within the scope of the charter, it may enter into the commercial contracts usual in such a business in the usual manner." So in Lowe v. L. and N. W. R. Co., 21 Law J. (Q. B.) 361; 18 Q. B. 632; a railway company were held liable to be sued for the actual use and occupation of the plaintiff's land, although no contract made under seal, or by the authority of a director, was proved. The court decided this case, not only on the grounds that when land was actually occupied, the law would imply a promise to pay a reasonable compensation for its use, but they also intimated that if it were necessary to refer to the provisions of the 97th section of the act, they would presume that there was a parol contract made by a director to pay for the use of the land. See also on the first point Finlay v. Bristol and Exeter R. Co., 7 Exch. 409, and on the last, Doe d. Birmingham Canal Co. v. Bold, 11 Q. B. 127; Pauling v. London and North Western R. Co., 8 Exch. 867; supra, note (m). So in Smith v. Hull Glass Co., 21 Law J. (C. P.) 106; 16 Jur. 595; 11 C. B. 897; a joint stock company were held liable to pay for goods which had been delivered and used for the purposes of the company, although the goods had been ordered by persons who had no authority under the statute to give such orders. See also the remarks made by Sir J. Wigram, V. C., in Nixon v. Taff Vale R. Co., 7 Hare, 148; Waring v. Manchester R. Co., Ibid. 482; and Pennington v. Tanriere, 18 Law J. (Q. In Clarke v. Guardians of Cuckfield Union, 16 Jur. 686; 21 Law J. (Q. B.) 349; Bail C. such entry signed by the chairman presiding at the meeting (p), and the minutes are then receivable in evidence, without further proof: (8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, s. 98.) And all acts done by directors are valid, although a director may have been disqualified or defectively appointed: (Sect. 99.)

Ordinary contracts considered.

Reserving for another occasion, the consideration of an important class of cases, which relates to the extent to which directors may pledge the credit and money of the company, by making contracts or sit, for the price of water-closets supplied at the workhouse by an order of the board, and erected with their knowledge and approbation. See also Smart v. West Ham Union, 10 Exch. 867; 11 Exch. 867; London Dock Co. v. Sinott, 27 L. J. (Q. B.) 129; Haigh v. North Bierley Union, 28 L. J. (Q. B.) 62. The foregoing cases relate to contracts wherein the corporations were sued as defendants, but the principle on which they are decided would also affect cases where they sue on contracts as plaintiffs. On this point Church v. Imperial Gas Co., 6 A. & E. 859, decides that a corporation created for the purpose of supplying gas may sue on an executed contract, whereby the defendants agreed to accept a supply of gas from year to year, although the contract was not under the common seal of the company. So, in the absence of proof of a contract under seal, a corporation may sue in assumpsit, for the use and occupation of land belonging to the corporation. Dean of Rochester v. Pearce, 1 Camp. 466. There is another class of cases in which all the courts agree that a corporation may contract by parol, instead of affixing the corporate seal, or calling a meeting of a board of directors. These are cases where the acts are trivial in their nature, and of frequent occurrence, and necessarily entered into for the proper management of the affairs of the company; such as the hiring of servants and other similar acts. Cope v. Thames Haven R. Co., 3 Exch. 341; 18 Law J. (Exch.) 345; Eastern Counties R. Co. v. Broom, 6 Exch. 314; 20 Law J. (Exch.) 196; Roe v. Birkenhead, Lancashire and Cheshire Junction R. Co., 7 Exch. 36; 21 L. J. (Exch.) 9; Giles v. Taff Vale R. Co., 2 E. & B. 822; Stevens v. Midland R. Co., 10 Exch. 352. It has been held both in England (Whitfield v. South Eastern R. Co., 27 L. J. (Q. B.) 229), and America (Philadelphia, Wilmington, and Baltimore Railroad Corporation v. Quigley, 21 Howard's Rep. 202), that a railway company is responsible for a libel published by its agents in the course of its business and their employment. See further, Manley Smith's Master and Servant, p. 11, 2nd ed.

It has also been decided that an attorney ought to be appointed under seal, to defend or bring actions for a corporation. Thames Haven Dock Co. v. Hall, 5 Man. & G. 274; Arnold v. Mayor of Poole, 4 Man. & G. 860. But in a case where a special act provided that the directors of a company might appoint or displace any officers of the company, Wightman, J., held that it was not necessary to show that the attorney to the company, who had signed a notice of appeal, was appointed their attorney under the seal of the corporation. R. v. Justices of Cumberland, 5 Railw. C. 332; 5 D. & L. 431, n. (a). So where an attorney agreed to refer an action brought against a railway company by a judge's order, it was decided that the submission was valid, though the attorney had no authority under seal to defend or refer the cause. Faviell v. Eastern Counties R. Co., 2 Exch. 344; S. C. 6 Dowl. & L. 54.

(o) The words used in this section confer a privilege, but do not exclude other evidence of the facts: per Lord St. Leonards, C., in House of Lords, Inglis v. Great Northern R. Co., 16 Jur. 895. See also R. v. Justices of Leicester, 7 B. & C. 6; R. v. Inhabitants of Birmingham, 8 B. & C. 29; Cole v. Green, 6 M. & G. 872; Smith v. Huggett, 31 L. J. (C. P.) 39.

(p) Where a statute required that the directors should keep a minute and entry of the orders and proceedings of every meeting of the directors, "which shall be signed by the chairman at each respective meeting," and the evidence showed that the minutes had been signed by the chairman, not at the meeting when the proceedings took place, but at the next meeting, over which he also presided as chairman,—it was held that the minutes were sufficiently signed. Southampton Dock Co. v. Richards, 1 M. & G. 448; S. C., 2 Railw. Cas. 215; 1 Scott, N. R. 219. This doctrine has been since affirmed in the House of Lords, and applied to the 98th section; see the judgment by Lord St. Leonards, C., in Inglis v. Great Northern R. Co., 16 Jur. 895; 1 M. & G. 112. See also on the same point London and Brighton R. Co. v. Fairclough, 2 Man. & G. 674; 2 Railw. Cas. 544; 3 Scott, N. R. 68; West London R. Co. v. Bernard, 3 Q. B. 873; Miles v. Bough, 3 Q. B. 845; 3 Gale & D. 119; Sheffield and Manchester R. Co. v. Woodcock, 2 Railw. Cas. 522; 7 Mee. & W. 574. But where, at a subsequent meeting, a minute not having been previously signed, a call was confirmed, held not sufficient. Cornwall Lead and Copper Mining Co. v. Bennett, 29 L. J. (Exch.) 157. See also Eales v. Cumberland Black Lead Mining Co., 30 L. J., Exch. 141.

entering into other engagements (q), we shall conclude this division of our subject by making a few remarks on some ordinary contracts, which are commonly brought under consideration.

As it would be quite foreign to the purposes of a railway company to draw or accept bills of exchange, it may perhaps be assumed that it could not have been the intention of the legislature to give the directors power to negotiate such bills; and, consequently, if the directors draw or accept a bill of exchange, and even describe themselves as directors, they could not bind the company by such an act, although they may make themselves personally liable to pay the bill (r). It has been decided that the directors of a cemetery company have no such power (s); and although a distinction may be suggested, that railway companies are accustomed to carry on the business of carriers, it is presumed that the same rule must prevail.

So as the powers to borrow money are always limited by the special act, the directors have no authority to borrow beyond the specified amount, and if they do, the company will not be bound by their act (t).

Nor will the company be bound by a cheque drawn by directors on the company's bankers, unless it be properly signed. Thus, where three directors of a railway company, in the name of the company, signed a document intended to operate as a cheque on the company's bankers, for payment to a third party of the company's money, and the document was signed by them in their own names, and countersigned by the secretary of the company, with the word "secretary" added to his signature, and a stamp bearing the name of the company was affixed, but the three directors did not appear on the face of the cheque to sign as directors, or to be directors: it was ruled that the document did not purport to be the cheque of the company, and was not binding on them (u).

We will here mention some decisions which relate to the construction of contracts, where no questions have arisen as to the authority of the directors to enter into the particular contract.

Where an obligation entered into by deed has by a subsequent act of Parliament been rendered impossible to be performed, a court of law will, it seems, take it for granted that due provision has been made for compensating the party who would otherwise have been entitled to recover damages, and the existence of the act may be pleaded in answer to an action on the contract (v). It seems, therefore, that when railway companies have become amalgamated, the legal rights of the company depend upon the powers which have been conferred upon them by Parliament, unfettered by previous agreements which are inconsistent with the plain intention of the legislature. In one case the House of Lords held the amalgamated company to be bound by a covenant entered into, by one of the companies, with a landowner, previous to amalgamation (x).

The plaintiffs, a railway company, agreed with the defendants as follows:—That a station on the defendants' line should be used equally by both companies, subject to the bye-laws of the defendants, and that a committee from each Board should be appointed to arrange the working of the traffic; that the cost of the station and the working should be borne equally; that the defendants should have the right of running with their engines on the plaintiffs' line, and that the plaintiffs should have the same right over the defendant's line, paying in either case a certain per-centage of the gross receipts to the company whose line was used; and that each company should provide station accommodation for the other for three years, according to certain specified conditions.

Duration of an agreement to grant running powers.

On this agreement there were two alternative constructions contended for; one, that the last article of the agreement was merely a licence to use the line interchangeably by the two companies, determinable at the will of the defendants; the other, that it was a contract binding on both parties for ever, not to be varied against either party without the consent of that party. Sir J. Parker, V. C., on a motion for an injunction, was of opinion that the latter was the true construction. The language of the agreement was not such as would be used in a mere licence or permission to use the line, determinable at pleasure. If, for a valuable consideration, one party said that another should have a right in the nature of an easement, primâ facie the inference would be, that it was not a mere licence determinable at the will of the grantor. His Honor said it was not immaterial to observe that the persons to whom the right was given were a body corporate, and at common law, a grant to them of the right of running engines on and using the line, without using any words of succession, as, to them "and their successors," would give a fee simple, without naming successors. If the language had been, that they "and their successors" should have the right of running their engines, there would have been no doubt. The word "successors," however, was not a word which was material when dealing with rights to be conferred on, or acknowledged to be made to, a body corporate. The word "company" meant a body which was to exist for ever; and therefore this contract was very different from a contract with an individual not using the word "heirs." It was a contract that the company—that is a body which endured for ever—should have a right of this description, and if the substance of the agreement were considered, it was evidently of a permanent nature (z).

Where by an agreement a manufacturer agreed to supply a company during three years, with such quantities of iron pipes as should from time to time during the said period be required by the defendants, at a certain price, it was ruled that the manufacturer was bound to supply all such pipes as were requisite to supply the reasonable wants of the company, in the course of the execution of the works authorized by the company's act (a).

Rights of contractor when engineer's certificate withheld.

Where, by a contract entered into with a railway company, it is stipulated that goods, e. g., coke (b), shall be supplied to, or works executed for the company, to the satisfaction of some third person or of their own officer or engineer for the time being, and that no money shall be paid by the company until his certificate is obtained, the obtaining of that certificate is a condition precedent to the right to the money. Until such third person, officer or engineer has spoken (c), the contractor has no rights which he can enforce, either at law or in equity (d). Parties therefore ought to be careful how they enter into contracts giving such powers. If, however, the works are to be executed to the satisfaction of the other party, then this satisfaction must be reasonable (e). And if the certificate of such third person is withheld unjustly, fraudulently or collusively, for the purpose of preventing the contractor getting his money, he may either sue the person withholding the certificate (f); or, perhaps, bring his action against the person who ought to pay the money, charging that the certificate is withheld in collusion with the defendant and by his procurement (g). Where a bill was filed against a corporation and their engineer for payment of the contract price of certain works, and the case against the engineer broke down, the bill was dismissed with costs, as against the corporation also (h). And in a case of this kind, where the transactions between the parties are of a complicated nature, the defendants will not be allowed to resist the plaintiff's claim in equity, upon the ground that the remedy is only at law (i).

5. The Control of the Shareholders over the Directors.

From the foregoing statement of the powers entrusted to the directors of a railway company, we have seen that the general superintendence and management of its affairs belong to them, and that the shareholders may always call a general meeting of the company, and at such meeting the majority may control and regulate the future proceedings of the directors (m).

Control of shareholders over directors.

The result seems to be, that the supreme control of the affairs of a railway company is vested in the shareholders, who have power at general meetings, due notice having been given of the purpose of such meetings, to originate proceedings for any purpose within the scope of the company's powers, and also to control the directors in any acts which they may have originated (n). On the other hand, the acts of the directors are valid, provided they are such as fall within the scope of their authority, until the shareholders interfere, by entering into resolutions, at a general meeting, duly called pursuant to the provisions of the statute (o).

If, therefore, the shareholders of a company are dissatisfied with the proceedings of the directors, the proper course is to convene a general meeting of shareholders, and thus submit the proceedings of the directors to the decision of the governing body; and if the directors do any act inconsistent with the decision of the general meeting, an injunction may be obtained against them (p). Courts of equity will not, however, enforce every duty, which the governing body of a railway company owe to their constituents, the shareholders. Whenever the acts of the directors are capable of being rectified by the shareholders themselves in the exercise of their own powers, equity will not interfere; questions of internal regulation and management must, therefore, be decided by the shareholders themselves (q).

Questions of internal regulation to be settled by shareholders at a meeting.

Example, Foss v. Harbottle.

Thus in Foss v. Harbottle(r), where certain shareholders of a company, who were dissatisfied with the conduct of the directors, neglected to summon a general meeting of the shareholders, but filed a bill in equity against the directors, Sir J. Wigram, V.C., observed:—

“It is only necessary to refer to the clauses of the act, to show that, whilst the supreme governing body, the proprietors, at a special general meeting assembled, retain the power of exercising the functions conferred upon them by the act of incorporation, it cannot be competent to individual corporators to sue in the manner proposed by the plaintiff. This, in effect, purports to be a suit by cestui que trusts, complaining of a fraud committed, or alleged to have been committed, by persons in a fiduciary character. The complaint is, that those trustees have sold lands to themselves, ostensibly for the benefit of the cestui que trusts. The proposition I have advanced is, that, although the act should prove to be voidable, the cestui que trusts may elect to confirm it. Now who are the cestui que trusts in this case? The corporation, in a sense, is undoubtedly the cestui que trust; but the majority of the proprietors at a special general meeting assembled, independently of any general rules of law upon the subject, by the very terms of the incorporation, has power to bind the whole body, and every individual corporator must be taken to have come into the corporation, upon the terms of being liable to be so bound. How, then, can this Court act in a suit constituted as this is, if it is to be assumed, for the purposes of the argument, that the powers of the body of the proprietors are still in existence, and may lawfully be exercised for a purpose like that I have suggested? Whilst the Court may be declaring the acts complained of, to be void at the suit of the present plaintiffs, who, in fact, may be the only proprietors who disapprove of them, the governing body of proprietors may defeat the decree, by lawfully resolving upon the confirmation of the very acts which are the subjects of the suit. The very fact, that the governing body of the proprietors assembled at the special general meeting may so bind even a reluctant minority, is decisive that the frame of this suit cannot be sustained whilst that body retains its functions. In order, then, that this suit may be sustained, it must be shown, either that there is no such power as I have supposed remaining in the proprietors, or at least, that all means have been resorted to, and found ineffectual, to set that body in motion.”

Lord Cottenham's approval of Foss v. Harbottle.

Lord Cottenham, C., in subsequent cases said, that he fully concurred in the observations made by Sir J. Wigram in Foss v. Harbottle, and that the judgment in that case correctly represented the principles and practice of the court, in reference to suits of that description (s). Lord Langdale, M. R., refused, on similar grounds, to restrain the directors of a company from enforcing a call on shares which it was alleged the directors made, so as to give an undue preference to two out of three classes of shareholders, for the purpose of executing works which the company had no power to make. His Lordship said that the case could only be considered, as an attempt to induce the Court to interfere in the internal management of the affairs of the company, and to take on itself to determine the question, what calls shall be made, and to determine matters which ought to be determined by the shareholders themselves at general meetings. The only foundation for relief was, the allegation that the calls, in the circumstances that had happened, were not wanted; that the plaintiff and other shareholders of a class to which he belongs were likely to be defrauded by a scheme formed by the other shareholders, to benefit themselves and other classes of shareholders, to the prejudice of the plaintiffs, and were proceeding to enforce calls on them in pursuance of such alleged fraudulent scheme. The bill contained many allegations of improper and fraudulent motives; but these allegations did not rest on any specific facts, sufficient to support the imputations, and the plaintiffs, so far from stating that any attempts had been made to bring the matters under the consideration of the shareholders, and to procure any resolution of the directors to be rescinded, stated the contrary, and that most of the shareholders, for whom he sued, had not attended the meetings, or made any attempt to correct errors that had been made. It did not appear from facts distinctly alleged that it might not be right and just to enforce payment of the calls complained of, either for the purpose of carrying on works which it might be necessary to complete, or for the purpose of paying debts, or answering liabilities, which must be provided for. It would be impossible for the Court to entertain jurisdiction in such a case as that, without assuming authority to interfere in the internal management of all companies and partnerships, whenever a question arose as to the proper amount of the call required for the lawful purposes of the act (t).

Foss v. Harbottle, approved by other judges.

But if it is absolutely necessary that the Court should interfere at once, because irreparable injury would be done, before the time for taking the necessary steps to call a general meeting of the shareholders elapsed, then the rule above mentioned seems not to prevail (u).

Cases where the rule does not prevail.

There is also a distinction to be observed between unauthorized acts on the part of directors, voidable only, and which it is competent for the governing body to confirm at a general meeting, and acts which are altogether void, and which may not be so confirmed (x). Thus, if directors are guilty of fraud or misconduct, in committing unauthorized acts in the name of the company, proceedings in equity may be taken against them by the shareholders who are aggrieved, and the Court will hold the parties liable for all losses and expenses sustained by their misconduct (y). And if the directors improperly withhold the seal of the company, so that it cannot be used, a bill may be filed against them in the name of the company (z). And where the liability arises from the wrongful act of the parties, each is liable for all the consequences, and there is no contribution between them. It is, therefore, not necessary to make all who may, more or less, have joined in the act complained of, parties to the suit. And although in general all such suits ought to be prosecuted in the name of the corporation (a), yet, if a case arises of injury to some of the members of the corporation, for which no adequate remedy remains, except that of a suit by individual corporators, in their private character, and asking in such character the protection of those rights to which, in their corporate character, they are entitled, the Court of Equity will dispense with the presence of parties, who would, according to the general practice, have been necessary parties to the suit (b).

If the acts are illegal, one or more of the shareholders may obtain relief in equity.

Lord Cranworth, V. C., observes on this point, in Beman v. Rufford (c), the principle on which these shareholders filed this bill is this, that they are entitled to file it on behalf of themselves and all others, because the Court will not tolerate any person saying that all are not interested in having the law of their company carried into effect. It will not allow any speculation that it would be more advantageous to do something which the act of Parliament does not authorize to be done; therefore it is, that in this, as in many other cases, one shareholder may file a bill on behalf of himself and others, although at a meeting of the company a great many of the other shareholders, even the majority, may say that they have sanctioned a different course of proceeding. So, in a case when the directors of a company applied a portion of the profits to the purchase of shares in another company, Lord Langdale, M. R., allowed an individual shareholder to take proceedings in equity, without requiring him to obtain the concurrence of the whole corporation in the proceeding (d). And a railway company holding shares in another company in the names of trustees, may be plaintiffs in such a suit, provided the trustees are made defendants (e).

But although one shareholder may undoubtedly, in general, file a bill, on behalf of himself and the other shareholders (f), for the purpose of restraining the directors from pursuing a line of conduct which is illegal; yet where a person, in the interests of some third person, purchases shares for the purpose of questioning the legality of the acts of the directors, and constituting litigation with an indirect view to the benefit of such third person, and not really for the benefit of the other shareholders, the Court will take into consideration not merely the interests of the individual plaintiff, but also of the whole company, and will very likely think the latter best protected by dismissing the bill with costs. Where, therefore, a railway company purchased a canal under the powers of their act of Parliament, and then proceeded, under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 42, s. 8, to take a lease of the tolls of another canal, and the clerk of a third canal company, which was likely to be injured thereby, took some shares in the railway company, and filed a bill on behalf of himself and the other shareholders in the railway, to prevent the acceptance of the lease,—it was held, that the taking of the lease was not ultra vires, and Lord Justice Knight Bruce added—

Rogers v. Oxford, Worcester and Wolverhampton R. Co.

“But if on the legal point there is room for doubt, the circumstances do not, in my judgment, render it imperative on the Court to act against the company, or to retain the bill to which the Attorney-General is not a party,—a bill certainly not filed with any view to the benefit of the company or its shareholders, nor likely, I think, to be of advantage to them. It describes with commendable accuracy the plaintiff's official connexion with the Grand Junction Canal Company, the managers of which, under the influence of motives obvious enough, but not including, I repeat, any wish to do good to the railway company or its proprietors, seem to have made him a shareholder in the railway company for the mere purpose of constituting this litigation, of which, in my opinion, it will be beneficial to those interests that he professes a desire of protecting, and be right, to dispose without more delay by dismissing the bill with costs” (g).

These views have subsequently been acted upon by the Lord Chancellor (h) and also by the Vice-Chancellors (i).

Acquiescence.

And if a shareholder neglects to apply for relief against any proceeding of the company, which is in excess of their powers, as soon as he is acquainted with the proceeding, he cannot afterwards obtain relief, at all events by injunction, because he will be deemed to have acquiesced in the steps taken (k).

Hare v. London and North Western R. Co.

“This Court, in dealing between the shareholders and the company, has usually three classes of cases called to its attention; namely, the class of cases in which the directors are doing something ultra vires of the directors, quà directors, but still within the power of the company as a body; and in those cases the Court has said, we will not interfere as in the case of Foss v. Harbottle (m), because, though they may be wrong to-day, the majority of the company may say they are right to-morrow. Then there is the class of cases where the whole company united has not the power to do the acts, either as regards the individual shareholders or as regards the public interest, or both. As regards the individual shareholders, take the case of applying part of the monies of the company for soliciting a new bill. It has been held, that you cannot apply any of the monies of the company to the obtaining of a new bill because the shareholder has contracted to belong to a given company for a given object, and has not contracted to do more. I think it would be difficult to say the public, as distinguished from the shareholder, has any interest at all in that; probably the Attorney-General might interfere, but I can scarcely see the ground for public interference.

“Then there is the other class of cases, where you are applying the capital of the company to an enterprise in which you are not entitled to speculate as a corporate body, without being liable to the consequences incident to individuals who speculate; and that is the case of the Great Northern Railway Company carrying coals (n). In those cases where the public has an interest, the shareholder also has an interest: he of course has the same interest, or an interest in a higher degree, than in the case put of the money being applied to the passing of an act of Parliament extending his enterprise; and he may, as well as the Attorney-General, sue, and may sue with or without the Attorney-General, as he may be minded; and the Court there is in the habit of saying that it will interfere on behalf of one of the shareholders without much scruple as to his motive.”

6. The Jurisdiction of the Courts to prevent Directors from exceeding their Powers.

General principles.

The general principles upon which Courts of Equity will interfere, upon the application of shareholders, to prevent railway directors from exceeding the powers entrusted to them by the legislature, may now be considered to be perfectly well settled, though, as we shall presently see, considerable difficulty has arisen, and must hereafter arise, in applying those principles to the circumstances of particular cases, especially those which approach the boundaries of what is or is not lawful.

The great principle which governs all these cases is this—that a railway company is a corporation established for a particular purpose, and the directors have no power to bind the corporation by entering into contracts for purposes foreign to the purposes for which the corporation was established; such contracts are ultra vires, and illegal (o).

The powers of a railway company are limited to the purposes for which it is established.

This principle, however, still leaves unsettled a question of almost still greater importance and difficulty, the question, namely, what is or is not foreign to the purposes for which the company was established. In extreme cases this question is easy of solution; but, as in other questions of degree, as we approach the confines of rectitude our difficulties increase, till we find it impossible to lay down a rule applicable to all cases (p). In each case, therefore, the question must be determined by the Court taking into consideration the acts of Parliament constituting the company, and other peculiar surrounding circumstances.

But let us consider the general principle. In an early case upon the subject (q), Lord Langdale, M. R., said—

Colman v. Eastern Counties R. Co.

“To look upon a railway company as in the light of a common partnership, and to be subject to no greater vigilance than common partnerships may be, would be greatly to mistake the functions which they perform, and the powers which they exercise, of interference with the public and private rights of all individuals in this realm. We are to look upon those powers as given to them in consideration of a benefit, which, notwithstanding all other sacrifices, is on the whole hoped to be obtained by the public, but the public interest being to protect the private rights of all individuals, and to save them from liabilities beyond those which the powers given by the several acts necessarily occasion, they must always be carefully looked to; and I am clearly of opinion, that the powers which are given extend no further than is expressly stated in the act, or necessarily and properly required, for the purposes which the act has sanctioned. How far those powers, which are necessarily or conveniently to be exercised for the purpose intended by the act, may extend, will very often be a subject of great difficulty. We cannot always ascertain what they are. Powers ample are given, for the purpose of constructing the railway—powers ample are given for maintaining the railway—powers ample are also given for doing all those things which are required for the proper use of the railway; but it has nowhere been stated that a railway company have power to enter into all sorts of transactions. Indeed, it is admitted, that they have not a right to enter into new trades, not pointed out by the act. But it is contended, that, without limit, they have a right to pledge the funds of the company, for the encouragement of other transactions, however various and however extensive, provided only they profess that that encouragement, being occasioned by the liability of their own shareholders, the object of that liability is to increase the traffic upon the railway, and thereby to increase the profit to the shareholders. Surely, that has nowhere been stated; there is no authority for anything of that kind. What has been stated is, that these things to a small extent have frequently been done since the establishment of railways. Be it so;—but unless those acts so done can be proved to be in conformity with the powers given by the acts of Parliament under which those acts are done, they furnish no authority whatever”(r).

(o) In Green v. Nixon, 27 Law J. (Chan.) 823, Sir J. Romilly, M. R., said, “The principle upon which this Court grants injunctions to restrain directors from pursuing objects at variance with the original scope of the company, would seem to imply that they would bind the assets and the shareholders of the company, and it is this which gives the shareholder so strong an interest to prevent the directors from misapplying the funds of the company.”

The powers of a railway company are limited to the purposes for which it is established.

Salomons v. Laing.

And in another case the same learned judge said—

“From a very early period, it has been the practice of the Court of Chancery to confine the use of partnership monies to the purposes for which they are held, and the same principle must be applied to the transactions of railway companies. These companies are invested with powers for a specific object, and they are therefore bound to apply all their monies and property for the purposes directed and provided for by the act of Parliament, and not for any other purpose whatever. When the expenses are paid, and the public purposes directed and provided for by the act are fully performed, any surplus which may remain, after setting apart the sum to answer contingencies, may, if not applied in enlarging or repairing the works, be divided among the shareholders. The dividends which belong to the shareholders, and are divisible among them, may be applied by them severally as their own property, but the company itself, or the directors, or any number of shareholders assembled at a meeting or otherwise, have no right to dispose of the shares of the general dividend which belong to the particular shareholder, in any manner contrary to the will, or without the consent or authority of that particular shareholder. Any application of or dealing with the capital, or any part of the capital, or any funds or money of the company, which may come under the control or management of the directors or governing body of the company, in any manner not distinctly authorized by the act of Parliament, is an illegal application, and if the directors should attempt to expend the funds of the company for purposes not authorized by the act of Parliament, so as to involve the shareholders in liabilities to which the shareholder, or any of the shareholders, never consented, relief will be given in equity”(t).

In accordance with these principles, an injunction was granted to restrain the directors of a railway company from entering into contracts, or applying funds belonging to the company in making payments in pursuance of contracts, of indemnity, which were about to be given by the directors to a steam-packet company, who proposed to establish a line of passenger ships in communication with the railway(u). So it is unlawful, and a breach of trust, if the directors,

Redmond, 10 C. B., N. S. 675, it was held to be lawful for the plaintiffs to make a contract with the defendant to provide steamers, for the accommodation of the traffic between Milford Haven, Dublin, and Cork. And where a railway company was bound to keep up steam-vessels for the purposes of a ferry, it was held that without any authority from Parliament, subscribe for or purchase shares in another railway (x).

In another case an injunction was granted, on the application of a shareholder, to restrain the directors of a railway company from expending any portion of the capital, in promoting a bill in parliament for improving a navigation upon which the railway company were empowered to erect wharfs and warehouses; although it was admitted that it would have been very beneficial and advantageous to the company, that the navigation should be improved in the manner proposed by the bill. And Lord Langdale, M. R., said, that although the question had never been before the House of Lords (y)—so far as the power of the Court of Chancery had extended, it had unalterably decided, that companies possessed of funds, for objects which are distinctly defined by act of Parliament, cannot be allowed to apply them to any other purpose whatever, however beneficial or advantageous it might appear, either to the company or to individual members of the company (z). So, on the application of a shareholder, an injunction was granted by Sir J. Romilly, M. R., to prevent directors from applying any funds in their hands towards the payment of the costs of a bill then in Parliament, by which it was sought to alter the rights of existing shareholders (a).

It makes no difference that the misappropriation of the funds will be beneficial to the company.

Upon similar principles it was held by the House of Lords (b), reversing a decision of the Court of Sessions in Scotland, that a railway company was not liable upon an agreement entered into by the projectors of it to contribute funds for constructing and enlarging a pier and harbour.

So again, upon an information filed at the relation of a shareholder those steamers, when not employed for the ferry, might be used for excursion trips, and were not bound to remain idle when not wanted for the ferry. Forrest v. Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire R. Co., 30 Beav. 40, aff. on appeal by L. C., July, 1861.

This decision was founded on the principle, that a company have no implied authority to incur expenses not provided for by the terms of the deed which regulate their affairs. Attorney-General v. Great Northern R. Co.

against a railway company (c), alleging that they bought and sold coal for profit, Sir R. Kindersley, V. C., granted an injunction to restrain the company from acting as coal dealers, and in giving judgment observed—

“An act of Parliament which constitutes a joint-stock company, (say a railway company,) may be for many purposes regarded as a contract with the public. It is true that it is a contract carried into effect through the medium or machinery of an act of Parliament, but it is in effect a contract between the promoters of that company and the public, and the company are bound by that contract; and although the act of Parliament which constitutes and incorporates the company contains no prohibition in express terms against engaging in any business, except that of making, and maintaining, and using the railway, there is implied in every such act of Parliament a prohibition, or (looking at it as a contract) a contract against ever engaging in any other business than that of a railway company. It is clear that that is the rule of law in the absence of any negative provision whatever prohibiting the dealing in any other matters; and that principle has been acted on over and over again. It is acted on constantly as between the different shareholders in the company. A single shareholder,—even if 599 out of 600 shareholders agreed to carry on a different business in addition to the railway business, and it was clearly for the benefit of the company, and if it was clear that they had made enormous profits from doing it, and were continuing to derive those profits,—a single shareholder has the right to say—‘That is not our contract amongst ourselves,—you shall not do it;’ and he may come and get an injunction.”

His Honor then observed, with reference to some of the observations made by counsel in argument—

“That it is perfectly immaterial what is the motive of the party in coming. In the case of The Eastern Counties (d), at the Rolls, where the company were engaged in establishing packets to trade from Harwich to the continent, I think a single individual, or one or two individuals, came: and it was proved to demonstration, that they were persons who had actually bought their shares in the railway company for the purpose of preventing this, because they belonged to some rival steam-packet company. But the motive has nothing to do with the matter; it is against law; it is against the contract between the shareholders; and it is against the contract which is made between the public and the company, when the company is incorporated for the purpose of carrying on their business as railway carriers. It is therefore illegal, and in effect, though not in terms, prohibited by the law to a railway company.”

Hattersley v. Earl of Shelburne.

And where an agreement provided for a number of things to be done, which were all for the purpose of accomplishing a certain object that was ultra vires, it was held by Kindersley, V. C., that the parties had no right by virtue of that agreement, until they had obtained the authority of Parliament, to do even those acts which, independently of the agreement, they did not require the authority of Parliament to do. But in granting an injunction to this extent, the V. C. refused to restrain two directors appointed under the agreement from acting, on the ground that the shareholders had power to remove them, and that restraining them might be detrimental to the business and interests of the company (e).

Where an agreement entered into by directors is partly illegal, the shareholders have a right to have it set aside so far as it is ultra vires (f).

And if an act is granted for the making of one entire line of railway, the company cannot abandon one portion of the line altogether, and expend the capital subscribed in making so much of the railway as they propose to complete. The rule is, that the obligation to complete the work is co-extensive with the authority to make it. No authority is given to substitute a less work, or part of the whole, and it is therefore unlawful to apply the capital collected on the faith of the whole work being completed, in completing only a part of it (g). So, when a company had powers to construct several branch and extension railways, and to raise certain distinct sums for each work, and the directors, having abandoned one portion of the railway, proposed to use a portion of the capital raised for the abandoned works, for the purposes of the other works, Lord Cottenham, C., said he was clearly of opinion that the shareholders, who subscribed their money for the purposes of the entire undertaking, were entitled in equity to the interposition of the Court, for the purpose of restraining the company from so applying the money. And an injunction was granted (h).

The obligation to complete a railway is co-extensive with the authority to make it.

It is clear, therefore, that a company have no right to engage or pledge their funds, or entangle their affairs, in unauthorized transactions, so as to place the existing funds in jeopardy; nor may they do so on the speculation that they may afterwards obtain parliamentary authority for doing acts which were unlawful at the time they were done (i).

The powers of a railway company are limited to the purposes for which it is established.

But where a railway company were authorized to make a line with branches, and they completed a portion of the line, but abandoned other parts of it, this is not a public mischief which entitles the Attorney-General to file an information, to prevent the company from opening the portion of the line which is completed, until the whole is perfect. *Attorney-General v. if the thing sought to be done, although illegal, would be nevertheless beneficial to the purposes which parliament had intended, and also to the parties, he should be disinclined to grant an injunction. See also S. C. on appeal, 21 Law J. (Chan.) 17, where Lord Cranworth, L. J., expresses a similar opinion. But in Caledonian and Dumbartonshire R. Co. v. Helensburgh Harbour Trustees, 2 M'Q. 418, Lord Cranworth, L. C., said, "The question is not whether it will be beneficial, but whether it will be beneficial in the mode sanctioned by the act." When acquiescence in the proceedings of the directors will bar shareholders from applying for an injunction, see Graham v. Birkenhead Junction R. Co., 2 Macn. & Gord. 160; 20 Law J. (Chan.) 445; Hodgson v. Earl of Powis, 21 Law J. (Chan.) 17.

(i) Logan v. Earl of Courtown, 20 Law J. (Chan.) 347; and what the directors cannot do after the formation of the company,

A railway company cannot delegate its powers to another company.

Great Northern R. Co. v. Eastern Counties R. Co.

It is also unlawful for a company, without authority from Parliament, to delegate its powers to another company. Thus, where a company had proceeded to a certain extent in making a railway, and being then in want of funds, they entered into an agreement with another company, that, when the line was completed, it should be worked by that company, who should have perfect control, and exercise all the rights of the original company for twenty-one years, and find stock and work the concern,—Lord Cranworth, V.C., held that this agreement was illegal, and restrained the parties from carrying it into execution (k). His Lordship decided this case, on the ground that it was not competent for a company, who had obtained parliamentary powers, to delegate these powers to another company; and this principle is now clearly established by later decisions. Thus, upon an application for an injunction to restrain a company from obstructing the engines of another company from passing on the line of the defendants' railway, upon the ground that the latter had, by agreement, given the plaintiffs a right to run their trains on the defendants' railway, and to use their stations and other conveniences, and it being necessary, in support of the plaintiffs' case, to refer to an agreement between the plaintiffs and a third company, which gave the plaintiffs certain rights over a line of railway adjacent to the defendants' railway, Sir G. Turner, V.C., refused the injunction, on the ground that the latter agreement was illegal. There lies, said that learned judge, at the root of this case, a question of public policy, which precludes the interference of the Court. It is impossible to read the agreement between the plaintiffs and the East Anglian Co. without being satisfied that it amounts to an entire delegation to the plaintiffs of all the powers conferred by Parliament upon the latter company. All the stock of that company is to be taken by the plaintiffs, without any obligation to restore it. The plaintiffs are to manage and regulate the railways of the East Anglian Co., for the purposes of the agreement; and, although in form it is declared that the instrument shall not operate as a lease or agreement, it amounts in substance either to one or the other. It is framed in total disregard of the obligations and duties which attach to these companies, and is an attempt to carry into effect, without the intervention of Parliament, what cannot lawfully be done, except by Parliament in the exercise of its discretion, with reference to the interest of the public (l).

certainly the provisional directors cannot do before for the purpose of binding the company. Caledonian and Dumbartonshire R. Co. v. Helensburgh Harbour Trustees, ubi supra; Leominster Canal Navigation v. Shrewsbury and Hereford R. Co., 26 Law J.

So where by an agreement the L. and N. W. R. Co. agreed for a term of ninety-nine years to work the lines of the Birkenhead Co., using the property and plant of the latter company, except certain specified lands, and the said company were also to fix the fares and rates of charge, and the L. and N. W. Co. were to be allowed a certain specified sum for working expenses, and at the termination of the agreement the property and plant were to be restored of the same working value; and there was also a stipulation that a joint committee should be appointed, but not to exercise powers inconsistent with the acts of Parliament of the respective companies; Sir J. Parker, V.C., decreed that this agreement was not within the power of either of the companies, inasmuch as it was impossible that it could be carried out, without delegation or transfer to the L. and N. W. Co. of some at least of the duties and powers which were given exclusively to the other company; and that although the B. Co. were not called upon to be carriers, nevertheless the working the line was a duty imposed upon them by act of Parliament. The B. Co. had therefore agreed to part with statutory powers, which they had no authority to part with, and to a body which, by their constitution, had no authority to accept them (m).

A railway company may not by agreement delegate its powers to another company.

Winch v. Birkenhead R. Co.

In another case on this subject, the facts were, that by an agreement, the Great Northern Co. undertook to bear harmless the Ambergate Co. against all liabilities, whether of canals or otherwise; and that, until they could procure an act of Parliament enabling them to work the Ambergate traffic on their own account, they would work such traffic under the agreement, and pay the Ambergate Co. such tolls as would, after answering all expenses and liabilities, furnish a certain specified dividend upon the capital of the Ambergate Co., and as soon as an act should be obtained, the Great Northern Co. undertook to guarantee a certain dividend on such capital. It was part of the agreement that the Great Northern Co. should apply for an act of Parliament to ratify the agreement. The Great Northern Co. was also to have the privilege of paying off the Ambergate shareholders at par, at any time after obtaining the act, those shareholders being relieved from any further call. A special general meeting of the Ambergate Co. had confirmed this agreement. Under these circumstances the plaintiffs, ten shareholders in the Ambergate Co., applied for an injunction, first to restrain the directors of the Great Northern Co. from applying their funds in payment of the liabilities of the Ambergate Co.; secondly, from making any payments to the Ambergate Co., so as to make up a dividend on their capital; and thirdly, from applying any of their funds in making application to Parliament for an act to ratify the arrangement complained of, and also from pledging the credit of the Great Northern Co. for carrying out the arrangement. The authorities we have already referred to were cited in argument, and Sir G. Turner, V.C., adopted these decisions, and said:—

“The first question is, what is the general principle which ought to be applied to cases of this nature? I take that point to be well settled. The principles which are to govern cases of this description between large companies, are the principles which regulate the rights of parties in ordinary partnerships. It must be considered, therefore, how this case would have stood if this had been an ordinary limited partnership. Here these companies have been formed for special purposes; that is, for the purpose of making railways between particular places, with power to carry passengers and goods between those places. In the case of an ordinary partnership formed for this purpose, I take it to be quite clear, that no majority of the partners could by any means bind the minority to make a railway, or to carry upon a railway between other and different places. Suppose a contract between a limited number of persons to trade between London and Oporto: I think it is quite clear that it would not be competent to any majority of partners to bind the minority to trade between London and Lisbon, although embarking in the same kind of trade, and in the same geographical direction. Again: suppose a number of persons agreed to horse a coach to run between London and Bath, it is quite clear that a majority of those persons could not bind the minority to horse it between Bath and Exeter. Then, I think, if the case rested there, I should feel little or no doubt on the subject; but it is the duty of the Court, in applying these principles, to consider all the terms of this particular partnership. (His Honor read 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 87, which had been referred to in argument(n).) The clause, in my opinion, gives a right to agree for leave to pass over another line with the ordinary incidents; but this is not saying that the clause gives a right, under colour of passing over, to acquire the whole trade of the company, over whose line such a passage takes place. The question therefore is, whether this is a bond fide agreement for ‘passing over’ the Ambergate line on terms within the meaning of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, or whether it has been entered into for other purposes, i. e. for the purpose of acquiring the trade of the Ambergate Co.; and there is no doubt in my mind, on the agreement itself, but that it was entered into with this latter and more general view. Nor is the agreement in other respects within the act. The payment here agreed to be paid is not a toll within the meaning of the act. Tolls are defined to be ‘dues receivable for the liberty of passing over highways, public or private.’ They are payments connected with the passing over. It is difficult to know what was the meaning of the word ‘tolls,’ as used in the 87th section of the act. It is not necessary to decide what are ‘tolls’ as the word is used in the act: it is sufficient for my decision that these payments are not ‘tolls’ within the act(o). I must therefore grant the injunction, as to the first and second branches, qualified, however, as to the first branch, in a limited manner.

“As to the third branch of the injunction, to restrain the defendants from applying their funds in payment of the expense of any application to Parliament, the case cited of Ware v. Grand Junction Waterworks Co. (p), makes no distinction between applying to Parliament for the purpose of altering the scheme and objects of the company, and defraying the costs of such application out of the funds of the company. But later cases have established the distinction, and it is clearly a distinction well founded in reason and sense. The injunction must therefore be granted as to this branch also of the application, but it must be confined to the proceedings on the agreement. That will leave untouched the injunction restraining the defendants from pledging the credit of the company" (q).

A railway company may not by agreement delegate its powers to another company.

There have also been a great number of cases at law, which have been decided upon principles similar to those which have governed the decisions in equity, which we have just been considering. But, inasmuch, as in the cases at law, the question has arisen between third parties and railway companies, and the decisions in those cases have consequently been influenced by considerations which do not apply to cases in which the question arises between shareholders and directors,—which are analogous to questions between partners inter se,—it is thought sufficient, in this place, to refer generally in a note to the cases at law (r).

Cases at law.

But it would seem to be the better opinion, after great litigation and prodigious difference of opinion amongst some of the most eminent judges, that arrangements made between railway companies, for regulating the traffic and dividing the profits of their respective railways, are not illegal (s).

Traffic arrangements.

And although the funds belonging to a company may not be devoted to other purposes than those for which they are raised, it is not illegal for a company to apply to Parliament, to vary the constitution or objects of the company, or to obtain powers to control its proceedings, as Parliament shall think fit, although a minority of its shareholders may be opposed to such application (t), provided no attempt be made to pledge the funds or the credit of the company, to meet the consequent expenses (u). It seems, therefore, that if persons connected with a company come forward with sufficient funds to defray the expenses of intended applications to Parliament, there is nothing illegal in the transaction, and equity would not interfere to prevent the company from proceeding with such applications. It is apparent that in many cases it would be the duty of the directors of a railway company to prosecute or oppose bills in Parliament (x), with a view to meet applications made by other companies, seeking powers, which, if obtained, would prove adverse to the interests of the shareholders of the company which they represent; and the courts of law and equity will not disapprove of arrangements which may be advantageous to a particular company, or which may be mutually advantageous to rival companies, and at the same time cause no inconvenience or loss to the public. Thus we have seen that, on the application of a shareholder, an injunction was granted by Sir J. Romilly, M. R., to prevent directors from applying any funds in their hands towards the payment of the costs of a bill then in Parliament, by which it was sought to alter the rights of the existing shareholders (y); but the learned judge refused to extend the injunction so far as to restrain the directors from proceeding with the bill altogether, as he was not of opinion that the nature of the case was such as to make an application to Parliament, for the purpose of authorizing the scheme, a breach of trust or of duty by the company (z). So where the Great Western R. Co. had contracted with another company, to take an interest in their undertaking, and the directors of the latter subsequently determined to apply for a bill in Parliament which, if carried, would be very unfavourable to the interests of the Great Western Co., Sir J. Parker, V. C., upon an application for an injunction to restrain the company from soliciting the bill in Parliament, or any other bill for the like purpose, granted the injunction

(t) That was the reason of having the Wharncliffe order, ante, p. 31.

(u) In Maunsell v. Midland R. Co., 32 L. J., Ch. 513, Wood, V. C., said:—"No doubt it is lawful for them to apply for a bill, but it is not lawful to expend one sixpence of the funds in procuring it." In that case the Vice Chancellor expressed an opinion that it was illegal for the company to covenant with a third party to apply to Parliament, since it would thereby render its funds liable in the event of its not applying.

(x) In Mozley v. Alston, 16 Law J. (Chan.) 227, Lord Cottenham, C., observed to counsel, in argument:—"There is scarcely a railway company in the kingdom which does not come to Parliament for extension of powers. If a single shareholder may come here at the beginning of the session, for an injunction to restrain such applications to Parliament, it would engross the whole time of this Court."

so far as to restrain them from using the funds or pledging the credit of the company, in making the application to Parliament, but he said that there was nothing illegal in the object of the application to Parliament, assuming it to be legally pursued by the company (a). And in a subsequent case already noticed, Sir G. Turner, V. C., said, that the distinction between a company applying to Parliament for the purpose of altering the scheme and objects of the company, and the defraying the costs of such applications, out of the funds of the company, was well founded in reason and sense, and he moulded an injunction accordingly (b).

Applications to Parliament to vary the constitution or objects of a company.

This distinction and the origin of the rule itself are thus stated by Wood, V. C. (c), in granting an application by a shareholder for an injunction to restrain the directors from applying any of the funds of the East Lancashire R. Co. towards promoting a bill for a new line (from C. to B.), and also from issuing or allotting any new shares purporting to be shares in the existing undertaking of the East Lancashire R. Co., except for the purposes and under the powers of any existing act of Parliament, and from receiving any money in respect of such allotment.

Vance v. East Lancashire R. Co.

"I have no doubt of the power of an existing company to apply to Parliament for an extension of its line. But it is somewhat more than this if it applies the corporate funds to that purpose.

"What is called the Wharncliffe Order (d) arose out the proceedings before a Committee of the Lords on the Stockton and Darlington Railway Bill, one of the first in which I was engaged when at the bar. We succeeded in that case, notwithstanding Natusch v. Irving (e), on two grounds; first, because that case arose on a private partnership, not on an incorporated company; and secondly, because we showed that our application did not involve necessarily any misapplication of the corporate funds. Then Lord Wharncliffe proposed as a Standing Order of the House, that, before any such bill should pass the House of Lords in future, three-fifths of the shareholders (f) present at the meeting should consent to an application being made for such bill. I think no doubt has ever existed since that time that it is competent to the directors to apply from time to time to extend their line to other purposes wholly beyond that contemplated by the original act of incorporation, and that no resistance of any individual shareholder is of any avail, if the consent has been obtained which I have referred to.

"It afterwards came to be considered before this Court how far any part of the existing property of a corporation could be applied in payment either of preliminary expenses or of the expenses of passing a bill through Parliament. Mr. Bird (g) contended, that, if it was once admitted that the directors had power to come to Parliament for the act, all powers incidental to that must be inferred. It is quite clear that this is too large an inference, for instance, one of the most necessary consequences of applying for an act, viz. the incurring expense, is just what this Court will not permit. If they apply to Parliament for an act, the Court will not prevent them from so doing on the ground of dissenting shareholders objecting to it: but they are not permitted to apply any portion of the funds towards any part of the expenses necessary for this new purpose. They cannot divert the fund to any purpose other than those sanctioned by the existing act of the corporation.”

Power of companies to agree to an amalgamation.

In a case in which a suit was instituted in equity to enforce an agreement, whereby two existing companies agreed to amalgamate^(h) their undertakings with a third company, and it was objected that, as the special acts contained no powers to authorize such a contract, the agreement was a nullity: Lord Cottenham, C., said—

“I am asked to treat this contract as a nullity, that is, to hold that all contracts which parties enter into, not having themselves the power to carry them into effect, therefore agreeing to apply to Parliament to give them such powers, are so utterly void that this court will not even protect the property, until an opportunity shall be afforded for an application to Parliament. The effect of such a decision would be to nullify many family arrangements entered into—many with the sanction of this court, but to give effect to which the powers of Parliament are indispensable. It would also nullify all contracts by projectors of companies before their act is obtained; and it is now twelve years since ⁽ⁱ⁾, I gave effect, against the incorporated body, to a contract entered into by the projectors of it, before their act was passed, but in contemplation of its passing, and now there are many other cases to the same effect. I am, therefore, not prepared to say, that a contract so entered into and sanctioned, is to be treated as a nullity, because some of its provisions may require an act of Parliament to carry them into effect ^(k).”

In another case, where a railway company applied to Parliament for an act enabling them to take a lease of another railway, but the application being opposed by a rival company, on the ground that the proposed amalgamation would destroy the traffic then existing on the line of the objecting company, an agreement was made between the parties that the opposition should be withdrawn; that a mutual account of the traffic of the three companies should be kept, and the amount received be divided in certain proportions by the companies, and that the company taking the intended lease should not compete for any traffic which properly belonged to the other company, and thereupon the act of Parliament was obtained; and the conditions of the agreement not having been observed, Lord Cottenham, C., was of opinion that it could not be said that any fraud had been practised on Parliament, for it had often been decided that parties may come to a private arrangement between themselves as a ground for not opposing a bill; neither could it be objected that the companies had not full authority to enter into the stipulations contained in the agreement as to the regulation of the traffic (l). This case was finally sent by Lord Truro, C., to law, and the Court of Queen's Bench determined that there was nothing in the agreement contrary to the duty which the parties respectively owed to Parliament, or to the public, or to their own subscribers; as to the first point, it had been clearly settled that an agreement to withdraw opposition to a railway bill in Parliament for a pecuniary or other consideration, was not illegal; secondly, that it was not injurious to the public, by giving in effect a monopoly to one company, because the parties did not propose by their agreement to endeavour to prevent competition generally, but only that one company should not compete or interfere with the other, upon the particular line mentioned in the agreement, which was in effect the same as if two persons engaged in one trade should agree not to compete with each other, within a particular district; and as to the last point the stipulation to divide the profits might be greatly for the benefit of the shareholders, for without some such co-operation of the companies, perhaps no profit would be made (m).

We shall have occasion hereafter—in treating on proceedings by mandamus and injunction, which properly belong to the subject we have been considering—to return to the investigation of the principles which have guided the Courts, in interfering with the contracts and proceedings of railway companies, whose transactions are daily becoming of greater magnitude and importance; and we shall find that, so far as they are applicable, the Courts have endeavoured to enforce the same rules for the regulation of their affairs, as belong to ordinary mercantile partnerships. If these rules are in any case insufficient for the due protection of the public interests, the proper remedy seems to be to appeal to the wisdom of Parliament for such legislative measures as may be necessary.

(t) The word "first" was inserted in consequence of R. v. Skeen, Bell, C. C. 97; 28 Law J. (M. C.) 91, where several, but a minority, of the judges held, that a statement made before a commissioner of bankrupts was a "disclosure" within 5 & 6 Vict. c. 39, s. 6, although the same facts had been previously proved before a magistrate. Now, no disclosure but the first will avail.

(u) In Burnes v. Pennell, 2 House of Lords Cases, 497, Lord Campbell, C. J., says on this subject "I repeat that it is most nefarious conduct for the directors of a joint stock company, in order to raise the price of shares which they are to dispose of, to order a fictitious dividend to be paid out of the capital of the concern."

Dividends must be declared out of profits alone.

Companies Clauses Consolidation Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, which is printed at length in the Appendix), provides that, previously to every ordinary meeting at which a dividend is intended to be declared, the directors shall cause a scheme to be prepared, showing the profits (v) (if any) of the company, for the period current since the preceding ordinary meeting, at which a dividend was declared, and apportioning the same, or so much thereof as they may consider applicable to the purposes of dividend, among the shareholders, according to the shares held by them respectively, the amount paid thereon, and the periods during which the same may have been paid, and shall exhibit such scheme at such ordinary meeting, and at such meeting a dividend may be declared according to such scheme: (Sect. 120.) No dividend may be made, whereby the capital stock will be in any degree reduced; but it is provided that the word "dividend" shall not be construed to apply to a return of any portion of the capital stock, with the consent of all the mortgagees and bond creditors of the company, due notice being given for that purpose at an extraordinary meeting to be convened for that object: (Sect. 121.) Before the profits are apportioned, the directors may set aside a sum to meet contingencies, or for enlarging, repairing, or improving the works: (Sect. 122.) No dividend is payable in respect of any share until the calls payable on all shares held by the owner thereof are paid: (Sect. 123.)

And by the Companies Act, 1863, it is specially provided that preference shares and stock issued under the authority of that act shall only be entitled to dividends out of the profits (x).

Dividends are supposed to be paid out of profits only, and when directors order a dividend to any given amount, without expressly saying so, they impliedly declare to the world, that the company has made profits which justify such a dividend. If no such profits have been made, and the dividend is to be paid out of the capital of the concern, a gross fraud has been practised, and the directors are not only civilly liable to those whom they have deceived and injured, but, in my opinion, they are guilty of a conspiracy, for which they are liable to be prosecuted and punished. There can be no doubt that a conspiracy by falsehood (as by a fictitious dividend), to raise fictitiously the market value of shares of a railway company, or any other joint stock company, that the Queen's subjects may be deceived and injured, and that at their expense a profit may be made by the conspirators, would be an indictable offence." Lord Brougham also remarked, "I view with the greatest severity the conduct of railway directors, in declaring dividends which can only be paid out of capital, because I consider that that is, of itself, a most vicious and fraudulent course of conduct. It is telling the world that their profits are large, when it may be their profits are nil, or that their losses are large, with no profits. It is a false and fraudulent representation by act and deed, much to be reprobated; and I go the full length of what my noble and learned friend has laid down, that it would be a just ground, if a course of conduct of this sort were pursued, coupled with such circumstances as clearly to show a fraudulent intent, for proceedings of a graver nature against these parties."

(v) Money borrowed by directors under the powers of their act is not payable out of the profits of the company; but debts incurred for rails, stations or the like, and debts which would have been paid at the time they were contracted if the company had held funds, are deductions to be made from profits, and are payable before the net profits can be ascertained, and before any division can be made among the shareholders. Corry v. Londonderry and Enniskillen R. Co., 30 Law J. (Chan.) 290.

(x) 26 & 27 Vict. c. 118, s. 14, post, Appendix.

After a dividend has been declared, each party entitled has a separate and independent right to recover it, and therefore, where a railway act provided that no dividends should be paid until the whole of a railway was opened for traffic, Lord Cottenham, C., decided that one shareholder could not sustain a bill, filed on behalf of himself and all other shareholders, for an injunction to restrain the payment of a dividend declared before the opening of the whole line (y). And by analogy with a series of decisions, as to the right to recover dividends arising from the public funds, each shareholder would seem to have a right of action against the company, to recover a declared dividend (z).

Each shareholder has a separate and independent right to recover the dividend declared on his shares.

A lien on shares seems to give, as accessory thereto, a right to receive the dividends accruing therefrom (a). Shares in a railway company appear also to be within 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 14, and may therefore be charged with the payment of a judgment debt, by a judge's order (b); and by the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 82, the provisions of that act are extended to the dividends arising from such shares.

Lien on shares.

Charge on dividends by a judge's order under 3 & 4 Vict. c. 82.

The Apportionment Act (4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 22), has been held (c) not to apply to dividends on railway shares.

Apportionment of dividends.

In connection with the subject of dividends, we may observe that, in a case, where the shareholders of a railway company had resolved that a number of new shares about to be issued should be "at the disposal of the directors," Sir J. Romilly, M. R., decided that the chairman of the board was not justified in retaining for his own benefit the amount of the premiums for which such shares were sold, although the full amount of the calls were subsequently paid to the company, by the purchasers of the shares. The same learned judge expressed a doubt whether the shareholders could have even expressly authorized such an appropriation of the profits arising from these premiums (d).

The rights of the holders of preference stock and guaranteed shares are well illustrated by the following cases:—

in the payment of "dividends" to the extent of 6*l.* per cent. per annum,) enacted, that the railway company should pay "dividends" to the holders of such stock, at the rate aforesaid, before they should pay any dividend to the holders of any other shares in the company. By a subsequent act, the company was empowered to issue other shares, called "debenture shares," bearing "interest" at 5*l.* per cent. per annum; and was directed to apply the annual profits in payment first of interest on mortgages; secondly, of interest on the debenture shares; thirdly, of the "interest or dividend" on the guaranteed or preference shares, and the arrears of such interest or dividends; and fourthly, as therein mentioned. A subsequent act referred to the preference shares as bearing a "preferential interest or dividend." It was held by the Lords Justices, upon a bill filed by a holder of 6*l.* per cent. preference stock, that the provision as to payment of "dividends" in the first-mentioned act must be construed with reference to the recital in it and to the subsequent acts, and did not mean a share of current profits merely, but entitled the holders of the preference shares to resort to a subsequent division of profits, to make their dividend up to 6*l.* per cent. It was also held, that a preferential shareholder is entitled to file a bill to restrain the company from making a dividend prejudicial to his rights, without waiting until there are funds to make a dividend (e).

Northern R. Co.*

The stock in the Great Northern R. Co. consisted of ordinary and preference stocks, the latter being created in pursuance of different acts of Parliament, and entitling the holders to preference dividends at different rates per cent. per annum. An officer of the company from time to time, during a period of some years, fraudulently issued fictitious stock of both kinds, which amounted in the whole to 220,000*l.* before the fraud was discovered. It not being possible to distinguish the genuine from the fictitious stock, an act of Parliament was obtained in 1857, by which the fictitious stock was declared valid; and it was enacted, that the directors should apply a sum of 243,000*l.*, which was applicable for profits up to December, 1856, in purchasing and cancelling stock equivalent to that which had been fraudulently created. It was then enacted, that it should be lawful for the directors to apply the balance of the 243,000*l.*, so far as the same would extend, in paying to the proprietors of the several classes of preference stock or shares the dividends to which they would have been entitled out of the said sum, if the same had been declared and apportioned as dividend, &c. the full amount of their dividends in 1856, claimed to be paid the deficiency out of the first half-year's profits in 1857; but this claim was resisted by the directors and the ordinary shareholders; and thereupon a bill was filed to obtain an injunction to restrain the declaration of a dividend on the ordinary stock, without regard to the prior right of the preference shareholders to be paid the full amount of their dividend. And it was held by the full Court of Appeal (affirming a decision of Wood, V. C.), that the preference shareholders were entitled to the injunction, it being considered that the right of preference shareholders was to have the full amount of their respective dividends before any payment in respect of dividends on the ordinary stock, and that the Act of 1857 had not deprived them of that right (f). In giving judgment, Lord Cranworth, L. C., said, "I have come to the conclusion, that what these statutes in fact guarantee to the favoured shareholders is a charge on all accruing profits, at the stipulated rate, before any thing is divided among the ordinary shareholders. This is, substantially, interest, chargeable exclusively on profits. There is nothing in such a use of the word 'dividend' which is at all at variance with ordinary usage. We speak of the dividends payable on the £3 per Cents., when in truth we mean no more than an annuity of 3*l.* chargeable upon and payable out of the public revenue."

By an act of Parliament it was enacted, that it should be lawful for any shareholder, who should have paid up one-half the amount of any share or shares in the Great Northern R. Co., to require each share to be converted into two half shares, whereof the one-half which should be so fully paid up should be denominated "Deferred half-share;" and the other half of such share should be denominated "Guaranteed half-share;" and thenceforth, in respect of each whole share so divided, the whole of the interest and dividends which would in each year have accrued, should be applied in or towards payment in the first place of interest or dividend after the rate of 6*l.* per cent. per annum on the amount paid upon the half-share so denominated "guaranteed;" and the remainder, if any, should alone be payable to the half-share so denominated "deferred," provided that the company should not pay any other or greater amount of interest or dividend upon the two half-shares than was for the time being paid on each undivided share. It was held by Wood, V. C., that the holders of guaranteed half-shares were entitled to be paid their 6*l.* per cent. in each year, not only out of the dividends accruing in that year, but out of all subsequent dividends; and therefore, if in any year the dividends were more than sufficient to pay 6*l.* per cent. on the guaranteed half-shares, the surplus must be applied in payment in the first place of all arrears due on those half-shares in respect of past deficiencies, before any dividend could be declared on the deferred half-shares. And it was also held, that the holders of the guaranteed half-shares having in a former year acquiesced in the declaration of a dividend on the deferred half-shares, whilst there was an arrear of dividend due on the guaranteed half-shares, although they had precluded themselves from making any claim in respect of those particular arrears, had not thereby renounced their rights in respect of subsequent arrears (g).

The accounts of the company, and their audit.

With respect to the keeping the accounts of the company, the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, (8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, which is printed at length in the Appendix,) requires the directors to cause full and true accounts to be kept of all matters and things for which monies have been received or paid: (Sect. 115.) The books must be balanced at the times prescribed by the special act, or, if no time be there prescribed, fourteen days at least before each ordinary meeting; and an exact balance-sheet must be made up, exhibiting a statement of the capital stock, credits, and property of the company, and the debts due by them, with a distinct view of profit and loss, on the preceding half-year: (Sect. 116.) The books and the balance-sheet are to remain open for the inspection of shareholders, at the office, for a time prescribed, before and after each ordinary meeting, and extracts may be taken (h); but at any other time the books cannot be inspected, unless by a written order signed by the directors: (Sects. 117, 119.) And at the ordinary meeting, the balance-sheet and report of the auditors must be produced to the shareholders: (Sect. 118.) A book-keeper must be appointed to enter the accounts and keep the books, and if he fails to permit them to be inspected by shareholders, he may be fined 5*l.*: (Sect. 119.)

Annual account of receipts and expenditure to be prepared for overseers.

An annual account of receipts and expenditure, certified by the directors and auditors, must also be prepared; and, if required, a copy must be transmitted to the overseers of the parishes, and clerks of the peace of the counties, through which the railway passes; and the public may inspect such account. A penalty of 20*l.* is incurred

The accounts of the company, and their audit.

Before any person is entrusted with the custody or control of money, the directors must take sufficient security from him (k): (8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, s. 109.) Every officer, when required, must render an account of all monies received by him, and deliver the vouchers for all payments, and pay over the balance due to the directors: (Sect. 110.) (l) If any officer fails to account, he may be summoned before two justices, who may determine the matter in a summary way, and adjust the balance owing, and order the officer to pay the amount, and, on default, levy the same by distress, or commit the offender to gaol for three months: (Sect. 111.) Or, if an officer refuses to deliver up vouchers, books, or other property, the justices may commit him until he does deliver them: (Sect. 112.) If an officer is about to abscond, he may be apprehended by warrant, instead of being summoned to appear before the justices: (Sect. 113.) But no such proceedings taken against an officer will deprive the company of any other remedy against the officer (m), or his surety: (Sect. 114.)

At the ordinary meeting after the passing of the special act, and every year afterwards, two auditors are to be chosen by the shareholders, unless a different number be prescribed by the special act: (Sect. 101.) An auditor must be a shareholder, but he cannot hold another office in the company: (Sect. 102.) One auditor goes out of office every year by seniority; but he is eligible to be re-elected: (Sect. 103.) If a vacancy among the auditors occurs during the current year, the shareholders may supply it: (Sect. 104.) Ordinary meetings for the election of auditors are subject to the same provisions as ordinary meetings for the election of directors: (Sect. 105.) The directors must deliver to the auditors the half-yearly or other periodical accounts and balance-sheet, fourteen days before the ensuing ordinary meeting at which they are to be produced (s. 106); and it is the duty of the auditors to examine them: (Sect. 107.) Accountants and other persons may be employed by the auditors, and the auditors may make a special report on the accounts, or simply confirm the same: (Sect. 108.)

Auditors to be chosen.

10. Remedies of Creditors against Shareholders.

Remedies of creditors against shareholders.

We have already remarked that a railway company are incorporated by the special act, and as a corollary from this, they are at common law amenable to such judgments as may be given against them in any suit, in respect of the corporate property only, and not so as to fix any liability on the members or corporators individually. The rule is, that the creditor of a corporation can have no remedy, except upon the funds or property of the corporation, there being no right, under a judgment against the corporation, to sue out execution against the individuals, who are members of the corporation(n). There is, however, an exception grafted on this rule of the common law, in cases where a shareholder has not paid up the full amount of his shares; for the statute enacts, that if any execution be issued against the company, and there cannot be found sufficient whereon to levy such execution, then such execution may (o) (by order of the Court, to be made after notice given to the shareholder) be issued against any of the shareholders (p) to the extent of their shares not then paid up; and the execution creditor may inspect the register of shareholders, to ascertain the names of the shareholders: (8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, s. 36, App.) (q). If the shareholder, by means of such execution, shall pay any money beyond the amount due from him for calls, he is entitled forthwith to be reimbursed such sum out of the funds of the company: (Sect. 37, App.) The provisions of this statute as to the power to issue executions against a shareholder being substantially the same as in those statutes where it has been decided that it is necessary to issue a scire facias(r), the proper course is to apply for a scire facias, in cases under sect. 36(s).

Though it is by no means clear that the Court has not power, however unwilling to exercise it, to issue an execution in the first instance, without any scire facias (t).

Remedies of creditors against shareholders.

A party who has recovered judgment against the company is not precluded from issuing execution against shareholders, though lands of the company have been delivered on elegit, if the proceeds of the lands are insufficient to pay the debt (u). But if a sum certain has been actually received from the rents of the land extended under the elegit, the scire facias can only issue for the residue of the debt. And where no sum has been received, and the only means of satisfying the debt arise from the future rents, it is in the discretion of the Court whether they will permit the scire facias to issue (x). In a case (y) in which a creditor obtained a rule nisi for a scire facias for execution against a shareholder, and it appeared that the company was in process of being wound up, and that, though it had no property against which execution could issue, a large sum stood to the credit of the official manager, the Court enlarged the rule till it should be ascertained whether this sum could be made available for satisfaction of the judgment. Subsequently, it appeared that this sum could not be made available till after the final determination of disputes between different classes of contributories, and that there was no prospect of these disputes being determined within any definite time; and it was held, that the existence of funds which might ultimately, under the winding-up acts, be made available for payment of the debt, was no bar to the creditor proceeding under sect. 36, and the Court made the rule absolute.

It is sufficient proof (in the absence of fraud) that the defendant was a shareholder at the time the debt was incurred, that he signed therefore necessary. It ought to be clearly shown that every effort has been made to levy the execution against the company; and where it merely appeared that writs of fieri facias had been issued into two counties against the company's funds, and that nulla bona had been returned to them, it was held to be insufficient to support an application for a scire facias. Ibid. 32. But the Court of Exchequer subsequently ordered a scire facias to issue, where merely prima facie evidence was offered that the former execution had proved ineffectual; and the Court also decided that the writ of scire facias must allege—that the defendant was a shareholder in the company; the amount of his shares, and the amount paid upon them; as well as the fact that the former execution was ineffectual—and that all those allegations are traversable. *Devereux v. the subscription contract, and that his name was on the register of shareholders (z). And even although it appears that the directors have (the subscription contract authorizing them to abandon the undertaking, or such part thereof as they should think fit) obtained an act merely for making a portion of the line, and the act has reduced the amount of capital and altered the number and value of the shares, and there is no evidence as to the manner in which the defendant's allotment was altered, if at all, still the evidence of the original subscription and registry is sufficient to prove him a shareholder, and render him liable for work done after the passing of the act of Parliament. Nor is it enough to rebut the prima facie evidence, nor any evidence of fraud on the part of the directors, that in the allotment of the substituted shares they appear to have registered themselves for a smaller proportionate number of shares in proportion to the number for which they originally subscribed, than the number for which they have sought to hold the defendant responsible (a).

I. Letters of Allotment and Scrip Certificates.

PREVIOUS to the passing of a railway bill through Parliament, the managing or provisional committee usually issue letters of allotment, and subsequently scrip certificates of shares (a). Whatever doubts were once entertained with respect to the legality of the practice, it is now well known that these scrip certificates are publicly sold at the Stock Exchange (b).

Letters of allotment and scrip certificates.

The purchasers have usually no legal transfer made to them by the vendor, or the parties who issued the scrip, but the transaction is completed by payment of the purchase-money, and the handing over the scrip; and these purchases are very frequently made for the mere chance of selling the scrip at an advanced price; and in many cases such speculations would not be entered into, if the purchasers were obliged to incur the expense of stamps, and a proper legal assignment of the scrip. Soon after the passing of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, which as we have seen is now repealed (c), a question was raised, whether the twenty-sixth section of that act did not render such sales altogether illegal; but it was determined that that section had no application to scrip or shares issued by railway companies (d).

Executory contracts for the sale of letters of allotment and scrip are therefore legal, and may be enforced (e). Such contracts need not be in writing, as they do not relate to an interest in land, nor to goods and merchandizes within the Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3)(f); neither does scrip fall within the description of goods and merchandizes used in the Stamp Act (55 Geo. 3, c. 184)(g). Contracts of sale, when reduced into writing, are not therefore exempt from stamp duties(h).

Stamp on contract notes.

And now by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 111, "Any note, memorandum or writing, commonly called a contract note, or by whatever name the same may be designated, for or relating to the sale or purchase of any government or other public stocks, funds or securities, or any stocks, funds, or securities, or share or shares, of or in any joint stock or other public company, to the amount or value of 5*l.* or upwards," must have a penny stamp(i).

Rights of holders of letters of allotment and scrip certificates.

It has been held that the mere possession of letters of allotment, or scrip certificates of shares, gives a prima facie ownership, for certain purposes, to the holders(j). Thus the owner of scrip certificates may, on his own behalf, and on behalf of other proprietors of scrip certificates, file a bill in equity, to restrain the directors of a company, which had issued the scrip, from misapplying the funds of the com-

(j) There are few decisions which throw light on this subject. In Daly v. Thompson, 10 M. & W. 309, the plaintiff brought an action on the case, against the secretary of a company, to recover damages for not delivering a certificate in respect of twenty shares, alleged to have been purchased by him, and for refusing to register the shares in his name. By the act, the number of shares were to be 10,000; and it appeared, that, before the plaintiff applied to the secretary, the whole number of 10,000 shares had been registered, in consequence of a fraudulent issue of fictitious scrip, and it was objected that the action would not lie, because the register was full, and the defendants had no power to add to the number of shares; and that appearing to be the case, the plaintiff was nonsuited. Upon a subsequent application to the Court of Exchequer, it was objected, that the plaintiff had not made out a good title to these shares, inasmuch as all that he had done, was to produce scrip certificates payable to bearer. Parke, B., said:—"The plaintiff must show that he was entitled as assignee of an original subscriber; and there is a serious question whether he could show that, merely by the production of the scrip certificate payable to bearer, in which it is stated that the share belongs to the bearer of the certificate. To say the least of it, there is great doubt whether any person, not authorized so to do, can make such evidence admissible by an act of this description, as in the case of bills of exchange payable to bearer, or promissory notes, or bills of lading, which are indorsed, and the property of which passes to the bona fide bearer of that indorsement. There must be a new trial, and if the plaintiff on that occasion cannot trace his title to the original subscriber, by showing who that subscriber was, and by proving an assignment from that person, and so on from all persons through whom the plaintiff claims, it will be a question whether he will be entitled to recover. All the members of the Court are not quite agreed in their view of the law upon this part of the case, and therefore I pronounce no opinion upon it at present." In a subsequent case, Heseltine v. Siggers, 1 Exch. 856, it was ruled, that scrip and stock may pass by mere delivery.

pany(k). So where letters of allotment were made by a company not registered, whose object was to establish a foreign railway, and scrip issued to the parties who presented the letters of allotment, and paid the deposits, whether they were the original allottees of the shares or not, and the holders of the scrip afterwards sold the same in the market, as if they were legally transferable by mere delivery, and the company having failed and the scheme become abortive, Sir J. Parker, V. C., directed that the dividend, declared on winding up the affairs of the company, might be divided amongst the scripholders for the time being, on the ground that the transfer which had been made, was the equitable transfer of a mere right to recover back the deposit, on a total failure of the scheme (l).

The practice being such as we have described, it frequently happens, that in the interval between the issuing of the scrip certificates, and the period when it is called in for the purpose of being registered, the scrip certificates pass from hand to hand on the Stock Exchange, and are the subjects of the ordinary contracts which take place in the share market. After the special act is obtained, many railway companies have been accustomed to register these holders of scrip as shareholders, without inquiring whether they were the original subscribers who had obtained the scrip, and signed the preliminary contracts, or not; and thus the registry of the shareholders has been made in numerical order, as the scrip is brought to the company's office, and not with reference to the numbers of the shares allotted, as denoted on the face of the scrip certificates. The legality of this proceeding was questioned in some cases, but it was determined, that parties when once registered as shareholders, under such circumstances, are liable to pay the calls on the shares, although they had never signed the preliminary contracts, or obtained any legal transfer of the scrip from the original allottees of the scrip (m). These decisions appear to be applicable to the provisions in the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, with respect to the registration of shares; and it may now perhaps be assumed, that, if the holders of scrip apply to the company, and are registered as shareholders, they thereupon become liable to pay all subsequent calls (n), so long as the shares remain registered in their names.

Scrip certificates are transferred for certain purposes without writing, and the holders are registered by the company as shareholders.

Wig-

But the company may refuse to register such holders, and place the names of the original allottees on the registry.

Original allottees may be registered by the company.

A change in the scheme originally proposed will not release an original allottee from the liability to be registered.

In all the cases above mentioned, the company, without offering any objection, registered the scrip, and placed the names of the holders on the register; and under the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, s. 8, post, App.), such a step, when taken, seems to constitute the party a shareholder. But a question of a different kind is raised, if a company should refuse to register the mere holder of scrip certificates, he not being the original allottee of the scrip. It is obvious, that in some cases it may be of the utmost importance, that a company, who are bound, after having obtained the special act, to carry out the undertaking (o), should be able to compel the parties, who signed the preliminary contracts, to come in and register themselves as shareholders; and accordingly the authorities show that the company are not without a remedy in such a case (p), for it seems that after the special act is obtained, they may, without the consent, and even without communication with the original allottees, insert their names in the registry of shares, and, being thus constituted shareholders, the allottees are made liable to pay all calls, although they may have sold the scrip, bonâ fide, in the market. Thus, where a holder of scrip certificates for shares to be allotted at a future time, by a contemplated railway company, executed the subscribers' agreement under seal, and sold his scrip in the market, and an act was afterwards obtained for making the railway, and his name was registered as a shareholder by the company, without his sanction, it was decided that until the name of the vendee of the shares was registered as the holder, the original subscriber was liable for calls made after the sale (q).

And further, it seems that if a subscriber for shares executes the subscribers' contract, which, as we have seen, usually gives extensive powers to the managing committee, he is bound by the provisions of the act which is ultimately obtained, even if it should authorize a scheme essentially different from that which was originally contemplated. Thus, where the subscribers' contract was for forming a company to make a railway from Dublin to Mullingar, and thence to Athlone, and authorized the directors to do all the transactions necessary for forming a railway from Dublin to Mullingar and ram, V. C., held, that he was a trustee for the purchaser of the scrip, and was bound to account to him for the proceeds of the sale of the shares. Beckitt v. Billborough, 19 Law J. (Chan.) 522; 14 Jur. 238; 8 Hare, 188.

(o) R. v. Eastern Counties R. Co., 10 A. & E. 531; R. v. Trustees of Luton Roads, 1 Q. B. 860; post, Part III., Chap. I., tit. "Mandamus," where we shall see that a company are not always bound to make a line they are empowered to make.

(p) The older authorities as to the mode of proceeding to recover calls against an original subscriber, who has never been registered, are Kidwelly Canal Co. v. Raby, 2 Price, 93; Great North of England R. Co. v. Biddulph, 7 M. & W. 243; S. C. 2 Railw. Cas. 401; West London R. Co. v. Bernard, 13 Law J. (Q. B.) 68; Thames Tunnel Co. v. Sheldon, 6 B. & C. 341; 9 D. & R. 278.

Athlone, and it also bound the subscribers to submit to such regulations as might be imposed by the legislature; and the act which was afterwards obtained empowered the company to buy and work a canal from Mullingar to Athlone, and to make a railway from Dublin to Mullingar only, it was ruled that the undertaking sanctioned by the act was not so different from that pointed out in the subscribers' contract, as to relieve the subscribers from being bound by it (r). These decisions are the more important because, as we shall see hereafter, if the name of a party is once properly placed on the register, the Companies Clauses Act imposes on him the duty of paying calls, just as if he had expressly agreed to pay them; and it seems to be no defence to an action to recover the calls, to say that the transaction was originally tainted with such illegality as would have afforded an answer to an action brought on an executory contract (s). But to proceed further in this place with the consideration of the liabilities of a shareholder, when placed on the register, would anticipate a subject which will hereafter be more conveniently discussed (t), and we conclude this branch of our inquiry by making some remarks on the responsibilities of allottees, who obtain scrip certificates, in cases where no special act is obtained, and the undertaking is consequently abandoned.

When a managing committee fail altogether in their application for parliamentary powers, it may become necessary to ascertain what remedies are available against the parties who have executed the subscribers' contract, to meet the necessary expenses incurred by the committee, in the prosecution of the scheme. In cases of this description, the subscribers' contract must be referred to, to ascertain the rights of the parties, and proceedings at law or in equity may be instituted to carry the provisions contained therein into effect (u). And in cases where the party applying for shares has failed to execute the subscribers' contract, or to pay the deposit, it depends upon the terms of the contract, as they are to be collected from the prospectus, taken in connection with the written application made for shares and the letters of allotment, whether the managing committee can recover damages for nonpayment of the deposits (x). To support such an action it is necessary that the managing committee should have acted with good faith; for it would be an answer, if it appeared that the contract to pay the subscription was obtained by means of false or wilful misrepresentations or misstatements, as to the affairs of the projected undertaking (y). And it is also settled, that such an action must be brought in the names of the parties with whom the contract was made. Thus, in an action brought against an allottee of shares, it appeared that the prospectus of an intended company contained a list of "provisional directors," and announced that applications for shares were to be made to "the provisional committee of management," which was subsequently appointed by a resolution of the provisional committee, and the committee thenceforward managed the affairs of the company. The defendant made an application for shares in the form prescribed, which contained a promise to pay deposits, and he received a letter of allotment from the secretary, stating that scrip certificates would be delivered in exchange for such letter. At the foot of the letter was a receipt for deposits, signed by one of the company's bankers. The form of receipt purported that the amount payable on deposits had been received "on account of the provisional committee." Between the application for shares and the allotment, some of the provisional committee withdrew and others were appointed. Under these circumstances, the defendant having been sued for non-payment of the required deposits, it was contended on his behalf that the application for shares was made to the general body of shareholders, and sent to the committee of management, as a part of that body appointed for convenience of communication, but not as having separate rights or powers; and it was also argued, that applications to be admitted to a joint undertaking would be swayed much by considering who were joined therein, and that, as some names had been withdrawn from the provisional committee and others added, the defendant ought to have the option of taking or refusing the allotted shares. Upon these facts the Court held that the plaintiffs had not proved the defendant's contract to have been made with them, and the plaintiffs were nonsuited (z). So where the defendant by letter requested the committee of a company to allot him a certain number of shares in the undertaking, and thereby undertook to receive the same or any less number, and to pay the deposit and execute the parliamentary contract and agreement when required, and in answer to

of the deposits, including the portion required to comply with the standing orders in parliament, may be applied in payment of preliminary expenses. Garwood v. Ede, 1 Exch. 264; 5 Railw. this application he received a letter from the company allotting him certain shares, but this letter was headed "not transferable:" it was held that this term qualified the acceptance, and that the two letters did not together constitute any contract. The ground of this decision was, that the proposal on the part of the defendant was for an absolute and unqualified allotment of shares; and the proposal and acceptance not being ad idem, it followed that there was no binding contract between the parties (a).

II. Shareholders.—1. The Registry of Shares.

The special act prescribes the amount of the capital of the company, and the register of shareholders is formed as soon as the act has received the royal assent. We have seen that it is the practice to register the names of the holders of the scrip certificates, but that the company have the option, if they elect to exercise it, of placing the names of the original allottees of the shares on the registry (b). By the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 16), the capital of the company is directed to be divided into shares, of the prescribed number and amount, and to be numbered in arithmetical progression, beginning with number one (c): (Sect. 6, App.) (d). Such shares are declared to be personal estate, and transmissible as such (e): (Sect. 7.) Every person who shall have subscribed the prescribed sum or upwards to the capital of the company, or who shall have otherwise become entitled to a share in the company, and (f) whose name is on the register of shareholders, is to be deemed a shareholder: (Sect. 8.)

I. The Registry of Shares.

by the common seal of the company (h): (Sect. 9.) When the register consists of several volumes, following each other alphabetically and consecutively, it has been held in the House of Lords, that it is sufficient if the seal of the company be attached to the last volume (i), and it is not necessary to prove that the seal was affixed to the register at an ordinary meeting of the company, as directed by the above section (h). But where a sealed register described the holders of shares as "Brownrigg and others, trustees," and the company sued Brownrigg and one Taylor, who was his co-trustee, for calls, it was held that the register was not even prima facie evidence that Taylor was a shareholder, although his name appeared in the alphabetical list of shareholders, which referred to the sealed register (l). A defendant may, however, show that he was unlawfully placed upon the register (m); or, under a plea denying that he is a shareholder, he may prove that he is not a shareholder de jure, so as to be entitled to take the dividends due on the shares (n). The plea of "never indebted" puts in issue the fact of the defendant being a shareholder (o).

Shares may be charged with judgment debts.

Where shares remain in the name of a party on the register, they may be charged with a judgment debt due from him, under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 14, which authorizes a judge to charge the shares of a judgment debtor "standing in his name in his own right, or in the name of any person in trust for him;" and it makes no difference that the owner of the shares had mortgaged or charged the shares to third parties for a valuable consideration, previously to the judgment

If shares in any public company in England, Ireland or Scotland, stand in the name of a bankrupt in his own right, the Court of Bankruptcy may order all persons, whose right or consent is thereto necessary, to transfer the same into the names of the assignees; and all such persons whose act and consent is so necessary, are thereby indemnified for all things done or permitted in pursuance of such order (q).

Shares belonging to bankrupts.

A shareholders' address book, containing an alphabetical list of all shareholders, with their places of abode and descriptions, must also be kept by the company, open to the perusal of every shareholder (r): (8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, s. 10, post, App.).

The holder of any share may demand of the company a certificate of the proprietorship of such share, under their seal. The certificate may be according to a form annexed to the act; (Sect. 11); and it is in all courts prima facie evidence of title, though the want of such certificate does not prevent the holder from disposing of his share: (Sect. 12.) If the certificate be lost or damaged, it may be renewed: (Sect. 13.)

2. Calls on Shareholders.

2. Calls on Shareholders.

Liability of shareholders and their representatives to pay calls.

With respect to the payment of subscriptions, and the means of enforcing the payment of calls, it is enacted by the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, App.), that persons who have subscribed any money towards the undertaking, or their legal representatives respectively, shall pay the sums respectively subscribed, or such portion thereof as shall from time to time be called for by the company; and with respect to the provisions in that act or the special act contained for enforcing the payment of calls, the word "shareholder" (t) shall extend to the legal personal representative of such shareholder: (Sect. 21.) The company may from time to time make calls (u) upon shareholders, provided that twenty-one days' notice, at least, be given of each call, and that the calls be made as prescribed; and every shareholder is liable to pay the amount of the calls so made by the company: (Sect. 22.) If calls are not paid on the day appointed, interest on the amount of the call is payable to the company: (Sect. 23.) The company may agree to pay interest to a shareholder who pays money in advance of calls: (Sect. 24.) If a shareholder fails to pay a call on the day appointed, the company may sue him for the amount, with interest, in any Court of law or equity: (Sect. 25.) And that, although the shares have been forfeited, but the value of the shares forfeited must be deducted from the amount due (w). Where companies are amalgamated, calls made by

(s) And a party, whose claim to be a shareholder is disputed by the company, may, in an action brought against the company, inspect any entries in the register, which relate to the matter in dispute. Foster v. Governor of the Bank of England, 8 Q. B. 689.

(t) By the interpretation clause, sect. 3, the word "shareholder" shall mean shareholder, proprietor, or member of the company; and, in referring to any such shareholders, expressions properly applicable to a person, shall be held to apply to a corporation.

(u) Circumstances may arise in the proceedings of a company, which would authorize the Court of Queen's Bench to issue a mandamus to compel the company to make calls on shareholders. R. v. Victoria Park Co., 1 Q. B. 292; and see post, tit. "Mandamus." But as the creditors of a company may now recover their judgment debts from shareholders who have not paid up the full amount of their shares, the remedy by mandamus will not in such cases be likely to be resorted to. See 8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, ss. 36, 37, post, Appendix.

the dissolved companies previous to amalgamation are payable to and may be enforced by the amalgamated company (u).^a

It has been decided that the company cannot maintain an action to recover calls against any person but a shareholder (v), nor against a shareholder, unless the call was made strictly according to the directions contained in the statute (x).

It may be remarked that making the call, and the notice of it, spoken of in sect. 22, are two distinct things; for the call must be made before the notice of its having been made can be given; and it has been decided that the call means the resolution of the board that a call shall be made (y). So it has been ruled that the directors, and not the company, are the proper parties to make the call (z).

The resolution need not specify the time or place for paying the call (a); it is sufficient if the directors appoint a time and place, which is notified to the shareholder by the notice, allowing him twenty-one days (b) for the purpose of payment. This was decided in Newry and Enniskillen R. Co. v. Edmunds (c). In that case an action having been brought to recover calls, one of the questions was, whether the calls were duly made, in pursuance of the twenty-second section. It appeared that a meeting of the directors had been held, at which it was resolved, that a second call be made, and "that one month's notice be given;" but the resolution contained no time or place for payment. The following notice was afterwards sent to the defendant, signed by the secretary of the company: "Sir,—The directors having made a call of 2*l.* 10*s.* per share, payable on or before the 8th of August next, you are requested to pay the sum of 125*l.*, being the amount payable, in respect of such call, of the shares held by you in

The resolution to make a call need not state the time and place of payment.

(x) The proper mode of giving notices to shareholders may be seen by referring to 8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, ss. 136 to 139, post, App. 40. In an action for calls, to show notice thereof to the defendant, the plaintiff proved that it was the course of business for C., a deceased clerk, to fill up printed notices of the calls, and direct them to the shareholders, and then to put them into a basket for another clerk to post, which he had done on the occasion of this call. A list of shareholders, containing the name of the defendant, was produced in C.'s handwriting, and indorsed by him, "Letters sent out." C. had received instructions to make out such a list, and had been filling up and directing the notices with such a list before him: it was decided that the list so indorsed was evidence that notice of the call had been sent to the defendant. Eastern Union R. Co. v. Symonds, 6 Railw. C. 578; 19 Law J. (Exch.) 287; 5 Exch. 237.

this company, to any of the under-mentioned bankers." It was objected on behalf of the defendant that the call was illegal, inasmuch as the resolution did not state the time and place of payment, and that the twenty-first section of the statute clearly showed that a time and place for payment should be appointed; but upon an application being made for a new trial, Lord Wensleydale said:—

"It is clear that the word 'call' is used in the act in two different senses. In one part it means, the application to the shareholders to pay; and in another, the amount to be paid. The sections which empower the company to make calls, contain no express direction that the same application shall be made to each individual for the same portion of the sum originally subscribed. Probably the directors may be under an obligation to do so; but I am certainly of opinion that it is not a condition precedent to their right to recover the amount of the call. If it were so held, the affairs of these companies would be in the greatest confusion; for suppose a notice by accident mislaid, the consequence would be, that the shareholder for whom it was intended would not be bound to pay his call; and those who had already paid on individual notices, and who might be supposed to have paid on the faith that the call was made on each equally, would have a right to claim from the directors the money they had paid, on the ground that it was paid under a mistake of the facts. That construction would be fraught with such evil consequences, that I think it impossible (putting a reasonable interpretation on the act of Parliament) to say that the Legislature intended that what they have not expressly declared, but which is only implied, should amount to a condition precedent. I am, therefore, of opinion, that it is not a condition precedent that each party should have notice to pay the amount of his call at the same time and place. It follows that the resolution to make a call need not specify either the time or place for payment; but the directors must appoint a time and place, which must be notified to the shareholder by a notice allowing him twenty-one days for the purpose of payment. The case of Great North of England R. v. Biddulph (d) proves that the resolution need not contain the place of payment; and I think that, by implication, it also proves that it need not contain the time of payment. The resolution is nothing more than a determination that thereafter 'a call' shall be made; that is, that an application shall be made to each shareholder for a proportion of his share; and it is enough if the directors appoint a time or place, either by public advertisement (where such a mode is allowed by the private act), as in the case referred to, or, under the general act, by an individual notice to each shareholder."

The notice of call may be waived.

There are some cases where a defendant cannot take the objection that a notice requiring him to pay calls has not been proved. Thus, if a party expressly promises to pay a demand for calls, the jury may infer that a proper legal notice was given, unless the plaintiffs affirmatively show, as part of their case, that an informal notice was in fact sent to the defendant. The rule seems to be, that when the Court does not know the facts, an express promise may enable them to infer that what is right has been done; but when the facts are known, and they are insufficient, then the promise does not make them sufficient (e).

(e) Miles v. Bough, 3 Q. B. 845.

And where the declaration averred "that the defendant had due notice of the calls, to wit, by notice in writing, signed by the then clerks of the trustees, and left at the then usual place of abode of the defendant," it was contended, that, as notice was averred, and not excused in the declaration, a promise to pay did not entitle the plaintiff to succeed in the action; but the Court overruled that objection (f). So after verdict it was held to be no objection in arrest of judgment, that the declaration did not expressly state that the calls were authorized to be made by the trustees (g).

It will be necessary to prove that the calls were made at the periods (if any) authorized by the statute; and it seems that a director, who was a party to the making of an illegal call, is not estopped from setting up the illegality of the call, as a defence to an action for calls brought against him (h).

And it has been said, that even if a statute contains no express direction that a notice of calls being made shall be given, still a party cannot be sued for non-payment of a call till he has received notice thereof (i). The rule is, that when an action is given only if the party shall neglect or refuse to pay, reason and justice require that the party should have notice (k).

Where a special act provided that three months, at least, should intervene between successive calls, and the directors, on the 11th January, resolved that a call should be made, to be payable on the 15th February; and on the 8th May, they made another call, to be payable on the 19th June; it was ruled that the calls were properly made (l).

It is now clear that calls may be made payable by instalments (m). But no action can be maintained until the last instalment is due (n), and no forfeiture is incurred until nonpayment of the last instalment (o).

Calls may be made payable by instalments.

Interest on the calls is recoverable under the count for calls (see sect. 27), and it is not necessary to add a count for interest (p).

Interest.

Having thus seen how the resolution to make a call should be entered into, and the notice thereof given to the shareholders, we may proceed to notice that the statute further enacts, "that in any action or suit to be brought by the company against any shareholder to recover any money due for any call (q), it shall not be necessary to set forth the special matter, but it shall be sufficient for the company to declare (r) that the defendant is the holder of one share or more in the company, (stating the number of shares,) and is indebted to the company in the sum of money to which the calls in arrear shall amount, in respect of one call or more upon one share or more, (stating the number and amount of each of such calls,) whereby an action hath accrued to the company by virtue of that and the special act" (s): (8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, s. 26, post, App. 28.)

The production of the register of shareholders is prima facie evidence of the defendant being a shareholder: (Sect. 28.)

(q) Where an action was brought in England by an Irish railway company to recover calls, the plaintiffs were required to give security for costs, upon the ground that it resembled the case of a plaintiff who resided in Ireland. Kilkenny R. Co. v. Feilden, 20 Law J. (Exch.) 141; 6 Exch. 81. Where a railway was partly in Scotland and partly in England, and the English Consolidation Acts were declared to form part of the special act, so far as might be necessary for carrying into effect the purposes of the act in relation to such portions of the railway as were in England, it was held that the company was a corporation with a double character, being both Scottish and English, and that a writ of summons served upon the secretary of the company in London was good service. See 8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, s. 135, post, App. 40; Wilson v. Caledonian R. Co., 5 Exch. 822; 20 Law J. (Exch.) 7; 15 Jur. 17. But where an act for making a railway from Dublin to Drogheda enacted that service of a writ upon a secretary of the company, or at the company's office, or by delivering it to some inmate at such office, or at the abode of the secretary, or, in case the same respectively should not be found or known, then service on any other agent of the company, or on any one director of the said company, should be deemed good service; and it being shown that the company had an office in Dublin, it was held, that a writ against the company ought to be served in Ireland, and that service of an English writ of summons upon a director in London was void; and the Court set aside a judgment founded thereon. Evans v. Dublin and Drogheda R. Co., 2 Dowl. & L. 865; 14 Law J. (Exch.) 245.

(r) The cases decided on this section, and a form of the declaration, are given, post, Appendix.

(s) In some of the earlier railway statutes a power was given to recover calls by actions of debt or on the case. See Huddersfield Canal Co. v. Buckley, 7 T. R. 36; Miles v. Bough, 3 Q. B. 845. Whether a company may set off the amount of calls due from the plaintiff, against a claim made by the plaintiff in respect of services performed by him for the company, and as to the form of such a plea, see Moore v. Metropolitan Sewage Co., 3 Exch. 333; 6 D. & L. 496.

But although the name of a party be found on the register, he is entitled to show that his name has been illegally placed there, without his authority; and a purchaser of shares, or even an original subscriber, cannot be sued for calls, until his name is placed on the register (t).

The entry of the name on the register is not conclusive evidence of the liability to pay calls.

So where the register was produced, and the defendant's name appeared there as the proprietor of fifty shares, but the evidence was that the defendant had applied for shares before the special act was obtained, and had paid the deposit thereon, but he had never executed the subscribers' agreement or parliamentary contract, the Court of Exchequer held that the company were not justified, under such circumstances, in placing the defendant's name on the register, and that he was not therefore liable to be sued for calls (u). The Court decided this case on the ground that the defendant was not a person who had subscribed the prescribed sum to the capital of the company, or who had otherwise become entitled to a share in the company, within the meaning of the eighth section of the Consolidation Act (x).

If shares are sold and transferred after a call has been actually made, but before any notice of it has been given to the vendor, the latter is liable to pay the call to the company; but that does not affect the right of the vendor to recover the amount of the call against the vendee, under the contract of transfer (y). And although the registered owner of shares be a mere trustee, he is, in the absence of a special contract to the contrary, alone liable to the company for the calls on such shares, and the company have no remedy, in equity, against the real or beneficial owner of such shares (z).

Let us now consider the defences which may be set up on behalf of a defendant in an action to recover calls. The usual plea is, "that he never was indebted as alleged," which puts in issue all the material allegations in the declaration, and consequently the fact that the defendant was a shareholder in the company, at the time the call was made (a). Under this plea he may not only dispute that he is a shareholder de facto, but may also show that he is not a shareholder de jure, so as to be entitled to share in the profits of the undertaking.

In Welland R. Co. v. Gowan, 30 Law J. (Exch.) 162, n., the Court on demurrer struck out a plea that the defendant was not a shareholder.

Pleas in actions for calls.

Thus, in a case where the special act enacted that the provisions of the general act, as to the distribution of the capital into shares, and the enforcing the payment for calls, should be incorporated with it, and that the company might create new shares in the manner to be agreed upon at a general meeting of the company, the defendant was allowed to plead never indebted, and that he was not a shareholder, and, thirdly, a plea traversing the making of the calls; but he was not allowed to plead that there had been no meeting of the company before the shares had been created; nor that the shares were not agreed to be created at a meeting of the company; inasmuch as both these questions would arise under the two first pleas (b).

And a plea that, after the making of the call and before the same was payable, the defendant transferred his shares to another, was held to be bad, as being an argumentative denial that he was indebted (c).

It is also a good plea that the call was not made by persons having authority to make it (d). And where the special act provided that the whole of the capital should be subscribed before the powers and provisions of the act should be put in force, and the company made a call on the shares before the subscriptions were completed, and commenced an action to recover the call so made, after the whole capital was subscribed; it was decided that the completion of the subscription list was necessary to enable the company to make the call, and that the action was not maintainable (e). But such a plea is no answer, in cases where there is no similar provision in the special act, as the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, s. 16 (f), which requires the whole capital of the company to be subscribed before the compulsory powers can be exercised, does not prevent the company from making calls before the whole of the capital is subscribed (g). Nor is it a good plea that the company had abandoned a part of the railway before the call was made (h); or that the call was not made within six years (i), as the action for calls being founded on a statute, there is the same period of limitation as on a record or specialty, viz., twenty years.

Before we leave the subject now under consideration, it is necessary to refer to some decisions, which show under what circumstances Infants, Bankrupts, and the Executors and Administrators of shareholders are liable to be sued for calls.

First, as to infant shareholders. By the express words of the statute, an infant is capable of becoming a shareholder (k); and it is clearly settled, that if he be registered whilst an infant, and remains a shareholder afterwards, he becomes liable to pay calls, whether they were made during or since his infancy, for the fact of his permitting his name to remain on the register as a proprietor of shares amounts to a ratification of the contract to become a shareholder (l). And an infant cannot defeat an action to recover calls by merely pleading that he was an infant when the calls were made; or that he was an infant at the time of becoming a holder of the shares, in respect of which the calls became payable; for, as he may have lawfully received the shares by bequest, or by purchase from the original proprietor, he must show on the plea the special circumstances which relieve him from liability—such as a disclaimer of the contract when he became of age (m).

Infant shareholders.

So where, in addition to the pleas above mentioned, the defendant pleaded that he had never ratified the proprietorship of the shares, or at any time derived any profit, benefit or advantage whatever by being the proprietor of the shares, and that such proprietorship had always been wholly unprofitable and useless to him; the pleas were held to be insufficient, because, if the defendant had attained his majority, he ought to have averred that he then disclaimed the contract, and if he was still under age, that fact ought to have appeared on the face of the plea (n).

It seems, however, that if an infant becomes a shareholder by purchase during his infancy, he may disaffirm the contract either when he becomes of age, or during his minority; and in pleading such disaffirmance as an answer to an action for calls, it is sufficient to allege "that the defendant disaffirmed and repudiated his contract, of which disaffirmance and repudiation the plaintiffs had notice, and that the defendant gave notice to the plaintiffs that he then held the shares at their disposal (o)."

(k) 8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, s. 79, post, App. 34. But a mandamus to register an infant shareholder has been refused in Ireland. Post, 112. note (q).

Infant shareholders.

The result of the cases seems therefore to be, that infant proprietors of railway shares are treated as purchasers who have acquired an interest, not in a mere chattel, but in a subject of a permanent nature, with certain obligations attached, which they are bound to discharge—like an infant purchaser of real estate, who has taken possession, and thereby becomes liable to all the obligations attached to the estate; unless he has elected to waive or disagree to the purchase altogether, either during infancy, or after full age, at either of which times it is competent for an infant to do so (p).

Bankrupt shareholders.

With respect to the liability of a bankrupt to pay calls made on shares after his bankruptcy, it seems that if the assignees refuse to accept the shares (q), the bankrupt may be sued for subsequent calls as they become due, notwithstanding he has obtained his certificate; and where after bankruptcy the trade assignee sent the official assignee a statement of the bankrupt's property, comprising in it the value of certain railway shares, and estimating the probable amount that would be forthcoming to work the fiat and pay dividend, and suggesting the propriety of selling the shares, it was decided that there was no evidence that the assignees had accepted the shares (r).

Executors and administrators.

Lastly, as to the recovery of calls from executors and administrators. The personal representatives of shareholders are, by the express words of the twenty-first section of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, made liable to pay calls (s). But it has been held that the statutory form of declaring for calls (t) is not applicable where an executor or administrator is sued for calls made during the lifetime of the testator, when he was the registered owner of the shares (u); a count therefore must be framed to meet the facts.

Bequests of shares.

Bruce, V. C., held that the purchaser of the shares had no remedy in equity against the infant after he became of age, on the ground that fraud had been practised by him, although the railway company had refused to register the transfer of the shares, because it was made during infancy. Stikeman v. Dawson, 1 De G. & S. 90; 16 Law J. (Chan.) 205.

been bequeathed, is sometimes a doubtful question, depending in each instance upon the terms of the bequest (v). Bequests of shares.

The current of recent decisions tends to show that where shares are specifically bequeathed calls due before the death of the testator must be paid out of his general estate, but calls due subsequently must be paid by the specific legatee who takes cum onere (w). In a case in which a testator gave to his son "any shares in railways, mines, and other undertakings that may belong to me at my decease," Kindersley, V. C., held that whatever payment was due at the time of the testator's death to constitute him a complete shareholder in the concern, and whatever calls were made at his death, must be paid out of his general assets; but if at his death he was constituted a complete shareholder in the concern, whether it was a going concern at his death or not, whether it was partially or wholly completed, all the calls made subsequently to the death of the testator must be borne by the specific legatee (x). Day v. Day.

In a case in equity, a testator, who, at the time of his death, was possessed of fifty original and seventy purchased shares in a railway, in respect of which all the calls had not been made, by his will gave thirty whole shares in the railway to trustees for the benefit of a married woman for life, without power of anticipation, and thirty shares to B.; and he declared that the legacies should not be held to be specific, so as to be capable of ademption. By a resolution of the railway company, new quarter shares were raised and offered rateably to the registered proprietors. Sixty new shares were offered to and accepted by the executors, and the deposit thereon was paid by them. It was decided that the bequests were specific, and that the income of the shares from the time of the testator's death belonged to the legatees; that the legatees were entitled to so many of the new shares as had been allotted in respect of the whole shares bequeathed to them, subject to the payment of the future calls; and that the testator's estate was liable to pay the calls on the whole shares purchased by the testator, as well as on the original shares; and a sufficient sum to cover the unpaid calls was ordered to be placed to a separate account, Jacques v. Chambers.

(v) Some cases determined before the passing of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act are to be found in the books. When the executor of an original subscriber to a railway company was held to be liable to pay calls made in the lifetime of the testator, as well as those made after his death, see Fyler v. Fyler, 2 Railw. C. 813; 3 Beav. 550; Blount v. Hipkins, 7 Sim. 51. and laid out, and the income meanwhile paid to the persons entitled (y).

So where a testatrix bequeathed some railway shares "and all her right, title and interest therein," it was ruled in equity, that money which the testatrix had paid in advance beyond the calls passed to the legatee (z).

And where a testator gave to trustees all his leasehold estates, and the residue of his monies, chattels, funds, railway shares, and other personal estate, on trust to convert into money all such parts as should not consist of government securities or railway shares, and apply the monies arising for the benefit of his wife and children, and after the death of his wife, if there should be no children, the testator directed his real estate to be sold, and the money arising therefrom, and from his residuary personal estate and effects, to be held upon certain trusts: it was decided, that the railway shares passed in the gift over, after the death of the widow (a).

3. Transfer of Shares.

3. Transfer of Shares.

Every shareholder may sell his shares.

With respect to the transfer of shares, the Companies Clauses Act provides, that every shareholder may sell and transfer his shares or his interest in the capital stock (b), by deed duly stamped, which may be according to the form annexed to the act (c): (8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, s. 14, post, App. 26.)

It will be observed, that the use of the form given by the statute is discretionary and not compulsory. But it is best always to adopt it, as the following sect. (15), which will be considered presently (d),

It will be seen that the form requires the seals of both transferor and transferee. This is in order that the company may have some one on the register who is bound to pay calls, and would therefore seem to be imperative as against the company, though, perhaps, directory merely as between the parties. See the case of a transfer of stock at the Bank of England, Foster v. Bank of England, 8 Q. B. 689. See cases cited infra, note (f), and the observations of Wood, V. C., in *Hare v. L. and N. W. directs that the deed of transfer shall be kept by the secretary of the company. And if it is intended to declare any trusts of the shares, or if the transfer relates to shares in more than one company, difficulties may arise, as the deed cannot of course be kept by more than one company; and where there are trusts, it is highly inconvenient that any company should have the deed declaring them. Convenience requires that the transfer which is to be kept by the company should be a simple conveyance of the legal title, merely showing who is shareholder (e). In such cases then there should be a separate deed of transfer for each company, and, if necessary, a separate declaration of trust. The necessity of this caution is exemplified by the following case. The holder of shares in a railway company, whose act incorporated the Companies Clauses Act, conveyed the shares, along with much other property, by a deed, not in the form given by the act, in consideration of 10s., and the natural love and affection which he bore to his sister, to a trustee in trust for her. It was held, that this, though not a sale, was a transfer within the meaning of sect. 14, (and not a transmission within sects. 18, 19,) and, consequently, that the trustee was not entitled to be registered as holder of the shares without delivering the deed to the secretary, to be kept by him as provided by sect. 15 (f). It has, however, been decided that two or more persons possessed of shares may join, and by one deed transfer their interests to a purchaser; and, in such a case, it is sufficient if the ad valorem stamp is attached, calculated on the consideration paid for the whole shares collectively (g).

The deed of transfer.

Copeland v. North Eastern R. Co.

Deeds of transfer should never be executed by the vendor with blanks for either the amount of shares or the name of the purchaser, as such deeds, though not recognized by the Committee of the London Stock Exchange (h), and void for most purposes (i), may yet, perhaps, in the hands of a bonâ fide purchaser for value without notice, be held to be good by estoppel as against the vendor, who may thus be cheated out of shares which he never intended to part with. Executing a transfer in blank is in truth, as was said by Lord Wensleydale in Hibblewhite v. M^r Morine, an attempt to make a deed transferable and negotiable like a bill of exchange or exchequer bill, which the law does not permit. The following cases show the folly of such an attempt:—T. being the holder of certain 20*l.* shares, and also of certain 2*l.* shares in the same company, instructed his broker to sell the latter. The broker sold the 20*l.* shares, and brought to T. for execution deeds of transfer, in which blanks were left for the name of the transferee and the number and numbers of the shares. The deeds bore stamps high enough to carry the 20*l.* shares, and were executed in blank by T. The deeds were delivered in this condition, together with the certificates for the 20*l.* shares, which had been fraudulently obtained by the broker, to bonâ fide purchasers, who filled up the blanks. Upon a bill filed by T., it was held by Wood, V. C., and his decision was affirmed on appeal, that the deeds of transfer were void, and that he was entitled to the shares expressed to be transferred thereby, and to have his name restored to the register (k). But in another case, in which S., a holder of shares in a joint-stock company, was induced by O. his broker to entrust him with deeds of transfer signed by S. in blank, and O., having afterwards stolen from S. certain share certificates, was enabled, by means of the blank transfers, to transfer to innocent purchasers for value the share certificates, and the names of the transferees were in due course entered on the register as shareholders instead of S. : upon a rule by S., under the joint-stock companies acts, to rectify the register, the Court of Common Pleas were equally divided in opinion as to whether they should interfere or not, and the rule dropped (l). A similar application was afterwards made to the Court of Exchequer, who directed an action to be brought by S. against the company, in order that the question might be put on the record. An action was brought and a verdict found for the plaintiff, subject to a special case. But upon argument the Court of Exchequer also were equally divided in opinion (m). Judgment, however, was given for the plaintiff, and that judgment was ultimately upheld in the Exchequer Chamber, though not without some difference of opinion amongst the members of the Court (n).

It is in general the duty of the purchaser to tender the deed of transfer to the vendor for execution, as in the case of a sale of realty; that is to say, the purchaser cannot bring an action against the latter, for a breach of contract, in not delivering or transferring the shares, without averring and proving such tender of the deed on his part (o). But by the custom of the stock exchange, and it is believed most other share markets, it is the duty of the vendor to prepare the transfer deed and reclaim the amount of the stamps from the purchaser (p). If the transfer requires the assent of the directors to make it valid, it depends a good deal, if not entirely, on the usage of the stock exchange in which the shares were purchased, whether it is the duty of the vendor or of the purchaser to obtain such consent. In general, it would seem that there is no absolute undertaking on the part of the vendor to obtain it. He is responsible, indeed, for the genuineness and regularity of all documents delivered, and bound to execute a transfer; but it is the duty of the purchaser to execute and duly lodge such documents for verification and registration in the books of the company, and to obtain a certificate of registration; and it would therefore seem to be the purchaser's duty, in the first instance, to endeavour to obtain the consent of the directors. At the utmost, the vendor is only bound to obtain such consent after the purchaser has done what is reasonable to obtain it in the usual course (q).

The deed of transfer.

An auctioneer who sells shares at a public auction, without declaring the name of his principal, makes himself personally responsible for the fulfilment of the contract of sale (r).

If shares are sold and the vendor prepares a deed of transfer, and demands the name of the transferee, which is refused, and the contract abandoned by the vendee, the vendor may sue the vendee for refusing to accept the shares; and, although at the time the deed of transfer was tendered there were calls unpaid, the defendant cannot set up as an answer that the plaintiffs were not ready and willing to transfer the shares, because when the plaintiffs demanded the name of the purchaser, they were in a condition, by paying the call, to make a valid transfer (s).

If a vendee of shares has been induced to purchase them by means of false statements made by the vendors, as to material facts relating to the condition and prosperity of the company, equity will decree the re-payment of the purchase money with interest, and the re-transfer of the shares to the fraudulent vendors (t). But if between the making of the contract and the discovery of the fraud, the vendee receive dividends or otherwise deal with the shares, he could not treat the contract as void and sue as for money had and received, but must bring an action on the deceit, and recover his real damage (u). So if directors make false representations for the purpose of fictitiously enhancing the price of shares for their own benefit, and a purchaser is thereby deceived and induced to purchase shares greatly beyond their value, the transfer of the shares will be set aside (x); and the directors making such false representations will be liable to an action for damages at the suit of the purchaser (y). Moreover, in order to sustain such an action it is not necessary that the representations should have been made personally to the plaintiff; the publication of a false report is sufficient if the plaintiff was thereby induced to purchase (z).

Forged transfer.

It may here be remarked that the company are bound to replace stock transferred by a forged transfer, as a forged deed is a mere nullity (a).

The register of transfers.

The transfer must be duly entered in the register of transfers in the manner directed by the statute, inasmuch as the body of shareholders agree to carry on the undertaking under all the provisions contained in the act of Parliament. The Court of Exchequer in one case held that an informal transfer would not bind the company (b). But, in the same case, it was afterwards ruled in equity, and that ruling was upheld in the House of Lords, that as the transfer was made in the usual manner by the secretary of the company, and was subsequently adopted by the company as being regularly made, the transaction was valid as between the company and the original transferor (c).

In one case, Lord St. Leonards, C., observed on this important subject of informal transfers of shares, "I do not say that directors can act in contravention of their powers—that if they abuse their powers, as between themselves and the general body of the shareholders, they can maintain an act done in violation of their powers. But that is a totally different question from that which is now before me, namely, whether, if directors, not pursuing or obeying their deed of settlement in respect of particular transactions, do choose to adopt a new rule, and hold out to the public that that new plan of theirs is a binding one, and men advance their money on the faith of that dealing, and they acknowledge a person who comes in under an imperfect transaction as a pur-

The deed of transfer must be delivered to the secretary of the company, who enters a memorial thereof in "The Register of Transfers," and delivers to the purchaser a new certificate, or indorses a memorandum of the transfer on the old one (d). Until a transfer has been thus delivered, the vendor continues liable for all calls, and the purchaser is not entitled to receive profits, or to vote: (8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, s. 15, post, App. 26.) No shareholder may transfer any share after any call shall have been made in respect thereof until he has paid such call, nor until he has paid all calls for the time being due (e) on every share held by him: (Sect. 16.)

The register of transfers.

The meaning of this section is, that, during the time that the calls remain unpaid, the right to transfer the shares is taken away, and the deed of transfer is altogether null and void as against the company, though valid as between the parties, so that the company may refuse to register such a transfer, although the calls have been subsequently paid up (f). In such a case it would be necessary to re-execute the deed of transfer, before the company can be compelled to register it (g). A different question would, however, arise, if the deed had been delivered as an escrow, to take effect upon payment of the calls by the transferor (h).

If shares are sold, and the transfer signed by the vendor, but the vendee neglects to register it, so that the company are entitled to demand payment of calls made subsequently to the sale from the vendor, whose name remains on the register, a bill for specific per-chaser and shareholder, and he admits and treats himself as bound by that which may be, and I assume it to be, an informal transaction, I say it is a totally different question altogether, and a distinct question, whether such a course of dealing will not operate so as to bind both parties, although the deed of settlement, in respect to formalities, is not obeyed, but a course of dealing and transaction has been adopted which may be considered, in point of fact, in direct opposition to the provisions of the deed of settlement. There would be no safety for mankind in dealings of this nature, extensive as they are, with so much money embarked in them, if the courts had ever held, as they never have held, that every minute circumstance must be observed, which the directors themselves ought to have observed; but if they disregard them, if the shareholders do not call them to account for doing so, if a course of action has been adopted in the particular company without complaint, although they may have arrived at making a man a shareholder, by what I should call a short cut, instead of going through all the necessary formalities,—that may be perfectly good as between parties thus dealing with the directors and the directors themselves, so as

formance of the contract may be maintained by the vendor, to compel the vendee to register the transfer and pay the calls (i). The principle is, that when shares are sold, it must be taken to be part of the contract, that the vendor should be indemnified by the purchaser from all liability in respect of subsequent calls made on the shares (k).

So where certain railway shares were sold by auction, and the purchaser paid his purchase money, but did not take a transfer of the shares, and then sold to a third party, who refused to register himself as owner of the shares, and calls were made on the shares, which were left unpaid; it was held, that the original vendor was entitled to a decree for specific performance, against the original purchaser (l). If, through the neglect of the purchaser of shares to register them, the vendor is compelled to pay calls, he cannot recover the money back as money paid to the defendant's use (m); but he may maintain an action against the purchaser upon his implied promise to indemnify the vendor (n).

Refusal to register.

If the company, without cause, refuse to register shares and deliver new certificates after the deed of transfer has been sent to the secretary, such a breach of duty would entitle him to sustain an action for damages against the company (o); and he might also obtain from the Court of Queen's Bench a mandamus at common law (p), or under the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854—peremptory in the first instance, if there were no issues of fact to be tried—commanding the company to register the transfer (q). Moreover, it is clearly a wrongful act, for which an action for damages may be sustained, if, in consequence of the refusal of the company to company have sued for the call or not: (8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, s. 29, App. 28.) But before a share can be declared to be forfeited, the directors must give twenty-one days' notice to the shareholder, such notice to be sent as is prescribed in the act (x): (Sect. 30.) Nor does the declaration of forfeiture take effect until it has been confirmed at a general meeting of the company; and such general meeting may direct the forfeited share to be sold, or otherwise disposed of (y): (Sect. 31.) The remedy is cumulative.

It is to be observed, that, by the express words (z) of the twenty-ninth section, the share may be forfeited, although an action has been brought to recover the calls. The remedy is therefore cumulative; and it has accordingly been decided that it is no answer to an action brought to recover calls, to plead that the shares had been forfeited and sold, before the action was brought (a). Neither is it an answer to such an action to plead that, after it was brought the shares were forfeited and cancelled, and that the company, under the provisions of the special act, had issued new shares, in lieu of those which were cancelled. But in either of the above-mentioned cases, the party sued is entitled, on motion, to the benefit of the sale of the shares, or the value of the new shares, in satisfaction pro tanto of the debt due for calls; and on payment of the residue of the debt and costs, the Court will stay the proceedings (b).

(z) If this provision had not been inserted, it seems that both remedies could not have been resorted to. In Giles v. Hutt, 3 Exch. 18; 18 L. J. (Exch.) 53, the directors of a company, acting under a deed, commenced an action, and proceeded to judgment against the plaintiff in audita querela, for the recovery of the calls due upon certain shares, and subsequently came to a resolution declaring the shares to be forfeited; but the Court held that the directors were not at liberty to adopt both remedies, and that, by proceeding to judgment for the full amount of the calls, the declaration of forfeiture was altogether void.

claim, in the shape of a demand for interest due on paid-up calls, the proper remedy is to apply to a Court of Equity for relief (c).

As we have already seen (d), if shares are wrongfully declared to be forfeited, the shareholder may bring an action against the company.

By the Companies Clauses Act, 1863 (e), power is given to the company to cancel forfeited shares if they cannot be sold for enough to pay arrears of calls, interest and expenses; but the cancellation does not affect the liability of the last registered holder to pay arrears of calls, interest and expenses: (Sect. 6.)

5. Traffic in Shares and Scrip, on the Stock Exchange.

There were few transactions in shares upon the Stock Exchange prior to the year 1824. The first quotation of this species of property occurs in the list published in that year, where an entry appears under the head of "Iron Railways." At that time there were very few railway shares in the market. A daily Price List of Shares is now published, with the sanction of the committee of the Stock Exchange. The members of the Stock Exchange consist of brokers, and dealers or jobbers. The broker is, in most instances, a sworn broker, qualified to act by admission before the corporation of the City of London. His legitimate province is limited to the transaction of business for his principals. He purchases and sells public securities and shares, for persons desirous to possess or dispose of them. The dealer or jobber acts as an intermediate party between the broker who buys, and the broker who sells (f); and the advantage he derives, is a small difference of price between the two transactions. When a broker has received an order from his principal, he applies to a jobber, who, being always aware of the prices of shares, enters into a contract with the broker, to buy or sell the shares, as the case may be, at the market price (g).

History of share transactions on the Stock Exchange.

There are certain account days in the year, called settling days, when bargains made between buyers and sellers of shares, on the Stock Exchange, are adjusted. Sometimes, instead of transferring the shares, and closing the account on the settling day, the shares are carried on to a future day, on such terms as the parties may agree upon. This is called a continuation (h).

Settling days and continuations.

(h) These transactions are sometimes mere wagers; and although it was decided that the 7 Geo. 2, c. 8, (which however was repealed by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 28,) applied only to jobbing in the English public funds, Oakley v. Rigby, 2 Bing. N. C. 732; S. C.

Contracts relating to shares are subject to the rules of the Stock Exchange.

The time fixed for the completion of an executory contract, for the sale and purchase of shares, is in most cases liable to be controlled, regulated and altered by the custom and usage of the Stock Exchange. If particular days are set apart by the usage of the stock market, for the settlement of accounts between brokers, and between brokers and their customers, and for the delivery and transfer of shares that have been agreed to be bought and sold in the intervening period, all contracts for the sale and purchase of shares, to be completed on a particular day, will be deemed to be made for the next settling day, that will arrive after the time so appointed (i). But when no time is specified for the completion of the contract, the printed rules and customs of the Stock Exchange are admissible in evidence to show what is a reasonable time, under all the circumstances of the case, for the fulfilment of the bargain, by the execution, on the part of the vendor, of the deed of transfer of the shares, and the payment, on the part of the purchaser, of the purchase-money (k).

If, therefore, there is, at a particular place, an established usage in the manner of dealing and making contracts, a person who is employed to deal or make a contract there, has an implied authority to act in the usual course. Thus, where the defendant authorized the plaintiff, a broker, to sell for him twenty railway scrip shares, and the plaintiff sold them to C., another broker, but the scrip shares not being delivered on the day, C. bought twenty other scrip shares at the market price, and claimed the difference between the contract and the market price, and the plaintiff paid him the difference, and afterwards brought an action against the defendant to recover this sum: and it being proved to be the usage amongst brokers at that market to be responsible to each other, upon these contracts, and 2 Hodges, 42, and not in railway shares, Hewitt v. Price, 4 M. & G. 355, it is necessary to consider the effect of the 18th section of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, which enacts, "That all contracts or agreements, whether by parol or in writing, by way of gaming or wagering, shall be null and void, and that no suit shall be brought or maintained in any court of law or equity, for recovering any sum of money or valuable thing alleged to be won upon any wager." This section applies to transactions relating to the purchase and sale of shares for the account, when neither of the contracting parties contemplate a bona fide purchase or sale of the shares. Grizewood v. Blane, 21 L. J. (C. P.) 46; S. C. 19 L. T. 64; 11 C. B. 538; Re Morgan, 30 L. J. (Bank.) 1; Barry v. Croskey, 2 Johns. & Hemm. 1. But a broker who has paid "differences" for his principal, may recover the amount notwithstanding this statute. Jessopp v. Lutwyche, 10 Exch. 614; Knight v. Cambers, 15 C. B. 562; Knight v. De Vere, 15 L. J. (Q. B.) 323; 4 D. & L. 97. When stockbrokers may decline to answer searching interrogatories as to transactions on the Stock Exchange, on the ground that the answers would subject them to penalties, see Short v. Mercier, 20 L. J. (Ch.) 289, where Lord Cottenham, C., affirmed Sir K. Bruce's, V.C., judgment, 18 L. J. (Ch.) 490. And see Green v. Weaver, 1 Sim. 404.

also that the defendant was cognizant of this usage (l), it was ruled that the plaintiff was entitled to recover (m). But a principal is only bound by such rules of the Stock Exchange as are in force at the time of the contract. In Westropp v. Solomon (n) the facts were, that the defendant employed the plaintiffs, stockbrokers, to sell for him some scrip certificates in a projected railway, and delivered the certificates to them for that purpose. The plaintiffs afterwards sold them and paid the defendant the proceeds of the sale. The certificates were afterwards discovered to be forged, and the plaintiffs were then called upon by the purchasers, to pay them the value put on them by a resolution of the Stock Exchange committee—come to subsequently to the sale by the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs accordingly paid those sums, which were larger than the sums for which they had sold the certificates, and the action was brought to recover the sums so paid by the plaintiffs. The defendant paid the amount received by him from the plaintiffs, with interest, and denied his liability to pay more, and it was decided that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover the excess. The first count failed, inasmuch as the law only implies a promise by a principal, to indemnify his agent when acting according to his instructions, and no express promise was proved; the common counts also failed because the sale was void on account of the forgery, and the purchasers were therefore (independently of Stock Exchange rules) entitled to nothing more from the plaintiffs, than the sum the purchasers had paid them, and, consequently, the plaintiffs could recover no more from the defendant. And it was also held, that no difference was produced by the Stock Exchange resolution, it being made subsequently to the sale by the plaintiffs, and there being no rule of the Stock Exchange, at the time of the sale, which required brokers to be bound, in respect of their contracts, by resolutions to be made on the subject.

Contracts relating to shares are subject to the rules of the Stock Exchange.

Westropp v. Solomon.

If, therefore, a sharebroker has been compelled, by the custom of the Stock Exchange, to pay money on account of his principal, he has a remedy over against the latter (o). But he can maintain such an action in those cases only, where he has paid money in discharge of some liability, which he has properly incurred in the regular discharge of his duty as a broker (p). And where a broker, in behalf of his principal, purchased shares, which were liable to a call, it was held to be the duty of the principal to supply the broker with money to meet the call (q).

A broker is not responsible if forged scrip should be issued.

A sharebroker employed to buy or sell shares or scrip of a railway company, does not thereby undertake to procure them absolutely and at all events, but only to use due and reasonable diligence to endeavour to do so (r). And if a sharebroker, directed to buy shares, buys what is ordinarily bought and sold in the stock market as shares, he has fulfilled his commission, and cannot be made responsible for the fraud or misconduct of parties who may have issued the shares without authority. There is no warranty or undertaking on the part of a broker employed to buy shares or scrip, that the article which merely passes through his hands is anything more than what it purports on the face of it to be, and what it is generally understood to be in the market (s). Thus where A. gave an order to B., a stockbroker, to purchase shares in a foreign railway, and there being no shares in the market, B. bought a letter of allotment, it being the practice of the Stock Exchange at that time to buy and sell letters of allotment as shares in that railway—in an action to recover the value of the shares and the broker's commission, it was decided, that the question for the jury to determine was, whether the order to buy had reference to that which alone could be bought in the market, at that time, or was an order to buy at a future time, when, by the passing of the foreign act, actual shares would be transferable and purchasable (t).

Lamert v. Heath.

So where the directors of a railway, called "The Kentish Coast Railway Company," having resolved not to issue scrip, some of the members, without their knowledge, issued scrip, signed by the secretary, from the office of the company; this scrip found its way into the share market, and was sold at a premium. The plaintiff employed his broker to buy some "Kentish Coast Railway Scrip;" and the broker applied to the defendant, who sold him some of the above scrip. In an action to recover the price paid to the defendant, as having sold a spurious article, it was decided, that the question for the jury was, whether the plaintiff intended to buy, and the defendant to sell, that which was current in the market, as Kentish Coast Railway scrip, or the real scrip of that company (u).

By 23 & 24 Vict. c. 111, schedule, title Contract Note (x), "Any note, memorandum or writing, commonly called a contract note, or by whatever name the same may be designated, for or relating to the sale or purchase of any government or other public stocks, funds or securities, or any stocks, funds or securities, or share or shares of or in any joint stock or other public company, to the amount or value of 5*l.* or upwards," is subject to a stamp duty of one penny. And by sect. 7, "the stamp duty on contract notes may be denoted either by impressed or adhesive stamps, and in any case where a contract note is made and the same is not written on an impressed stamp, there shall be affixed thereon a proper adhesive stamp, and every person who shall make or sign a contract note to which an adhesive stamp shall be affixed, shall effectually cancel and obliterate the stamp by writing upon or across it his name or the name of his firm or the initials thereof respectively, and by adding thereto the date of such cancelling, and so and in such manner that the said stamp cannot be used upon or for any other document or writing (y); and if any person shall make or sign any contract note by this act chargeable with stamp duty, without the same being duly stamped to denote the said duty, or shall refuse or neglect to cancel and obliterate as aforesaid any adhesive stamp affixed thereon, he shall forfeit the sum of twenty pounds, and no charge for brokerage, commission, agency or otherwise, made or to be made by any broker, agent or other person in or about the sale or purchase mentioned, or referred to in any contract note made or signed by him, shall be lawful unless such contract note shall be duly stamped and the stamp thereon if adhesive properly cancelled."

Stamp on contract notes.

We have already seen that the transfer of shares must be made in accordance with the directions contained in the Companies Clauses Act (z); and that by analogy with the rule as to the conveyance of real property, it has been decided, that it is the duty of the purchaser of shares to prepare the necessary transfer and to incur the expense of the stamps, unless indeed it appears by the terms of the contract, or by the usage of the market, that the seller is to prepare and pay for Obligations relating to the transfer of shares.

(x) Brokers' notes were formerly held not to require a stamp, not being agreements between party and party. Joseph v. Pebrer, 1 C. & P. 341; Tomkins v. Savory, 9 B. & C. 704. In Knight v. Barber, 2 C. & K. 333; 16 M. & W. 66; 16 L. J. (Exch.) 18; 4 Railw. C. 674, it was held that an agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant for the sale of railway scrip required an agreement stamp, such scrip not being "goods, wares or merchandize" within the exemption in the Stamp Act, 55 Geo. 3, c. 184, Sched. Part I., tit. "Agreement."

an adhesive stamp used for denoting any stamp duty is required by law to be cancelled by any person by writing thereon his name, or the name of his firm, it shall be sufficient if instead of the name in full, the initials thereof shall be so written, or shall be stamped or impressed in ink thereon, together with any other particulars specially required by law to be written thereon: provided that, by means thereof, the stamp shall be effectually obliterated and cancelled so as not to admit of its being used again, anything in any act to the contrary notwithstanding."

(y) By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 91, s. 33, it is further enacted, that "in any case where the transfer (a). But it is clearly the duty of the seller to give the purchaser the means of placing his name on the register; and if, through the default of the former, the shares cannot be registered in the purchaser's name, an action will lie against the vendor (b). But if, by the terms of the contract, the purchaser is bound to pay a call on the shares, made before the sale, then the broker of the purchaser may pay the amount of the call to the broker of the seller, to enable the latter to make the transfer; and an action will lie against the purchaser at the suit of his own broker, to recover the money so paid on his account (c).

Mode of assessing damages.

Some cases have been decided as to the proper mode of assessing the damages, in actions relating to contracts in respect of shares. Thus in detinue for railway scrip, which had been delivered up to the plaintiff after action brought, it was ruled to be a proper direction to the jury, that in estimating the damages, they might take into consideration the difference in value of the scrip, at the time of the demand, and at the time of its delivery. Also, that inasmuch as the scrip had already been re-delivered, the verdict and judgment were properly confined to an assessment of damages for the detention (d).

In an action against a vendee for not accepting shares on a given day pursuant to contract, the proper measure of damages is the value of the shares on the day when the contract was broken, or on the earliest subsequent day when the shares could be sold (e).

So the vendee of shares in a projected railway, under a contract to be completed at a future day, may recover, as damages for the non-delivery, the difference between the price agreed on, and the market price of the day on which the sale should have been completed; but he is not entitled to damages in respect of a further advance of price taking place afterwards at the time of the actual issuing of the scrip (f).

In connexion with the subject now under our consideration, we annex some of the most important of the rules relating to bargains in shares and stock, as adopted by the Committee of the London Stock Exchange (g).

General Rules applicable to Stock Exchange Transactions.

Bargains must be fulfilled according to regulations of the Stock Exchange.

49. The Stock Exchange does not recognize in its dealings any other parties than its own members; every bargain, therefore, whether for account of the member effecting it, or for account of a principal, must be fulfilled according to the regulations and usages of the house; and should a principal without the consent of the committee attempt to enforce by law a claim against a member of the Stock Exchange, the committee will decide as to the liability of the broker or agent of such principal for any cost or damages incurred in consequence of legal proceedings.

54. The committee will not recognize any dealing in letters of allotment either of loans or shares in new companies.

55. A member applying for stock or shares of loans or public companies, and neglecting to pay the deposit on the same, shall be considered to have violated a contract, and shall be compelled to fulfil his engagement.

56. No clerk shall be allowed to apply for an allotment in loans or shares without the written sanction of his employer, who shall be responsible for the payment of the deposit on the stock or shares so applied for.

59. The committee will not take cognizance of bargains in prospective dividends of shares or stock of railway or other industrial companies; nor will they allow differences arising therefrom to be proved upon a defaulter's estate.

60. All disputes between members, not affecting the general interest of the Stock Exchange, shall be referred to arbitration; and the committee will not take into consideration such disputes unless arbitrators cannot be found, or are unable to come to a satisfactory decision.

65. The committee will not decide any question respecting the loss incurred by buying in or selling out stock, or other securities, unless such question be referred to them within fourteen days from the day on which such purchase or sale took place.

66. Buying in or selling out stock, shares, or other securities, must be effected publicly through the medium of a broker, who shall trace the transaction to the responsible party, and claim the difference thereon, except in the case of English stock; when the bought in or sold out ticket shall be passed directly to the person against whom such purchase or sale shall have been made.

Rules applicable both to English Stock and Stock and Shares of Public Companies.

78. A member having sold stock or other securities, and transferred or delivered the same according to the tickets or directions given him by the buyer, has a right to demand payment of such buyer; but in case the seller apply to the member whose name is on the ticket, and is either refused payment, or receives a cheque which is dishonoured, the buyer shall make immediate payment.

79. Every member may demand payment of the difference between the price marked on the ticket and that at which he may have sold the securities, when the sale shall have been made below the price existing at the time of the ticket being tendered; or, if sold above the existing price, he shall be entitled to receive up to the price of the day.

Rules applicable to Shares and Stock of Public Companies.

80. All bargains in shares or stock when no time is specified, and all bargains made before twelve o'clock on name days, shall be considered to be made for the existing account.

81. The committee will not take cognizance of any bargain in stocks or shares effected for a period beyond the end of the ensuing two accounts.

82. An offer to buy or sell an amount of shares or stock at a price named, is binding as to any part thereof that may be a marketable quantity; and an offer to buy or sell shares or stock when no amount is named, is binding to the amount of ten shares if in value under 500*l.*, or a number not exceeding in value that sum, or to the amount of 1,000*l.* stock.

83. The seller of registered shares or stock is responsible for the genuineness and regularity of all documents delivered, and for such dividends as may be received until reasonable time has been allowed to the buyer to execute and duly lodge such documents for verification and registration in the books of the respective companies. When the buyer shall have obtained an official certificate of registration of such shares or stock, the committee will not take cognizance of any subsequent dispute as to right or title, until the legal issue has been decided between the buyer of such stock or shares and the company that has acknowledged and registered the same; unless there should be any circumstances of a questionable nature on the part of the seller, when the committee reserve to themselves the right of inquiring into and deciding the case upon its merits. The reasonable expenses of any legal proceedings are to be borne by the seller.

84. The committee will not (except under special circumstances) interfere in any question arising from the delivery of shares, stock, bonds, or debentures in blank transfer.

85. When shares of railway or other companies have been converted into consolidated stock, and are so quoted in the authorized list, buyers are required to pass names for stock, and not for shares.

86. The buyer of stock, shares, bonds, or debentures, shall pass a ticket for the same at a marketable price and containing the name and address of the buyer before twelve o'clock on the name day, either in the Stock Exchange or at the office of the seller; and in the event of his not doing so, should the stock, shares, bonds, or debentures be sold out, the loss, if any, shall fall upon him; it is therefore required, if the ticket should not be passed before twelve o'clock, that the person taking it should certify the same on the back thereof. The time for selling out shall be from half-past two to three o'clock. If the ticket be regularly passed before twelve, the person holding it at two o'clock shall be responsible for the loss occasioned by selling out on that day; but should the stock or shares not be sold out until the following day, then the person who held the ticket at three o'clock on the preceding day shall be liable. Every person passing a ticket is required to write on the back of the ticket the name of the member to whom it is passed.

Every person who receives a ticket "after two o'clock" or "after three" on the name day shall notify the same on the back of the ticket by drawing a line or otherwise, in order to facilitate the tracing when shares are sold out; and any person neglecting to do so will be held responsible for any loss that may be incurred.

When the name day is fixed for a Saturday, the time for selling out shall be from half-past twelve to one o'clock, and the person holding the ticket at half-past twelve o'clock shall be liable.

Every member dividing a ticket shall retain the original ticket, that access may be had to it should any portion of the shares have been sold out; and any member who has passed on the original ticket shall be required to trace it, in the event of any portion of the stock or shares having been sold out.

Tickets may be left at the office of the seller up to one o'clock on name days.

87. A member who makes an alteration in a transfer ticket for stock or shares, or improperly detains the same, shall make good any loss that may occur thereby.

88. The seller of shares or stocks shall cause the same to be transferred at the price marked upon the ticket given him by the buyer; but the seller shall not be compelled to take a ticket for stock or shares at a price not quoted in the authorized list during the account, unless the bargain represented by such ticket shall have been made within the two preceding accounts.

89. The seller is authorized to pay any call made on registered shares, although not due, and to claim the same of the buyer.

90. The buyer of transferable shares or stock shall pay the ad valorem duty, and all expenses attending the conveyance of the same; and shall state on the ticket the amounts in which he may desire to have the shares or stock transferred (provided no such amounts require a higher stamp than 9*l.* 10*s.*), and the seller shall pay any increased expense caused by the subdivision of a ticket. Split tickets must bear the name of the original buyer.

91. The buyer of shares or stock shall, in the event of his ticket being divided, pay for any portion of the shares or stock which may be presented, provided the number be not less than ten shares, or the value less than 200*l.*

92. The buyer of stock or shares may refuse to pay for a transfer unaccompanied by coupons or certificates, unless it be certified thereon officially that the coupons or certificates are at the office of the company. But if the transfer presented be perfect in all other respects, the stock or shares must not be bought in until reasonable time has been allowed to the seller to obtain from the office the verification required. If the seller have a larger coupon than the amount of stock conveyed, or only one coupon representing stock conveyed by two or more transfers, the coupon may be deposited with the secretary of the share and loan department of the Stock Exchange, who shall forward it to the office of the company, and certify to that effect on the transfers, which shall then be a valid delivery. No person is to look to the managers or committee of the Stock Exchange, as being liable for the due or accurate performance of those duties, the managers and committee holding themselves and being held entirely irresponsible in respect of the execution, or of any mis-execution, or non-execution of the duties in question.

93. The buyer is entitled to new shares or stock issued in right of old; but a member who has sold or taken in shares or stock, and afterwards, but previous to delivery, becomes entitled to new shares or stock, shall not be compelled to subscribe for the same, but may, after due notice, call upon the buyer, if he makes a claim, to complete the bargain forthwith.

94. The committee will entertain no claim for new shares attaching to the purchase of old ones, unless such claim shall have been made in writing within reasonable time, and any dispute with regard to a claim for new shares must be brought before them within ten days after the first settling day appointed for the delivery of the same.

95. In the event of sales of shares which carry with them shares not yet issued, and which cannot be conveyed by the transfer of the old, the committee will upon application fix a price at which the new shares shall be settled; and until the delivery of the new shares, the purchaser shall be entitled to deduct the amount so fixed from the purchase-money of the old shares or to reclaim it if already paid.

96. A member not refusing an antedated ticket when tendered as such, takes it with all its liabilities, but if it be passed as an ordinary ticket, the liabilities remain with the member putting such ticket again into circulation; and any person holding an undated ticket for shares shall not be liable for any loss arising from the shares having been bought in if he can show that such ticket had not been ten days in his possession.

97. A member, who shall allow two clear days to elapse without availing himself of his right to sell out shares or stock, shall release the buyer from all loss caused by the failure of any party, through whose default the ticket was not passed.

98. When stock or shares are sold out, if a ticket be not given within half an hour after the time of sale, the transfer may be made into the name of the buyer; and in cases where a name is guaranteed the rule shall apply as if the stock or shares had been actually sold out.

99. Registered shares or stock if not delivered within ten days may be bought in against the seller, at or after twelve o'clock on the eleventh day after the date of the ticket, and all loss incurred thereby shall be paid by him. The broker employed to buy in the shares is required to give one hour's public notice before proceeding to make such purchase, and if the purchase be not made or attempted within half an hour after the expiration of the time fixed, the notice shall be cancelled. Shares or stock thus bought in, and not delivered by one o'clock on the following day, may be repurchased for immediate delivery without further notice, and the loss (if any) shall be paid by the member causing such repurchase. If there be a profit on the transaction it shall be paid to the treasurer of the fund for decayed members.

100. A member who shall allow fifteen clear days from the date of the ticket to elapse without buying in, or attempting to buy in, registered shares or stock, shall release the seller from all loss caused by the failure of any member through whose default the shares or stock were not delivered, unless such right has been waived at the request or with the consent of the seller. The right to buy in shares or stock is limited to the original buyer, whether the name of the first buyer or that of any other member is placed on the ticket to pay; but in order to identify the original ticket, the name into which the stock or shares are to be transferred must be stated on the order given to the broker employed to buy in, to whom holders of overdue tickets may apply.

On the day previous to, and on the name day of, every settling day in securities deliverable by transfer, the clerk of the house shall, at twelve o'clock, fix the making-up prices for such securities at the actual market prices; and no making-up shall be binding, unless at such fixed prices.

101. On name days the clerk of the foreign market shall (with the concurrence, if necessary, of a member of the committee) fix the prices of shares at three o'clock (or on Saturdays at one o'clock), at which prices unsettled accounts shall be temporarily made up, and the differences paid in the usual way.

102. No person shall be required to pay for registered shares or stock presented after half-past two o'clock, or after one o'clock on Saturdays.

Rules applicable to Securities deliverable to Bearer.

103. All bargains in foreign stocks or scrip shares when no time is specified shall be considered as made for the existing account.

When new shares are awarded to the holders of old ones, how the parties are to proceed.

Time limited wherein the committee will entertain disputed claims for new shares.

Committee will fix a nominal price of the new shares, pending their issue.

Liability of parties taking antedated or undated tickets.

Shares for which names not passed must be sold out within two days.

The purchaser of shares, or stock sold out, must give a name within half an hour; and those who guarantee a name must also give it within half an hour.

Shares not delivered within ten days may be bought in.

If shares which have not been delivered are not bought in within fifteen days, the seller is released from liability.

Price of shares to be taken at three o'clock on name days, at which all open accounts to be made up.

Time for requiring payment for shares or stock.

Bargains where no time is fixed.

Limit as to the time of dealing for future accounts.

American bonds and shares, what amount deliverable.

Securities not paid for in time may be sold out.

Payment for foreign stock or scrip shares cannot be required after three o'clock.

Time when foreign stock or scrip shares must be delivered.

Securities subject to periodical drawing by lottery or otherwise.

A member allowing three days to elapse without buying in scrip shares or bonds, loses his claim against original seller.

When making up prices are to be fixed.

Prices to be taken at three o'clock on settling days, at which all open accounts shall be made up.

Foreign coupons when returnable, &c.

Bonds, if torn or damaged, to be returned within three days.

Railway bonds.

104. The committee will not take cognizance of any bargain in foreign stock or scrip shares effected for a period beyond the end of the ensuing two accounts.

106. No member shall be required to accept the delivery of a certificate of American shares of a larger amount than ten shares of 100 dollars each nominal capital, or twenty shares of 50 dollars each, nor an American bond of a larger amount than 1,000 dollars, except upon special contract.

107. The seller of foreign stock or scrip shares for a particular day, which the buyer is not prepared to pay for by half-past two o'clock on that day (or half-past twelve on Saturdays), may sell out the same and claim of the original buyer any loss incurred.

108. A member shall be required to pay for foreign stock or scrip shares presented up to half-past two o'clock on account days, or until three o'clock on any other day except on Saturdays, when he shall not be required to pay for the same after one o'clock.

109. Foreign stock or scrip shares bought for any period, except the account day, which shall not be delivered before half-past two o'clock (or half-past twelve on Saturdays), may be bought in on the same or any subsequent day, and any loss occasioned by such repurchase shall be borne by the seller.

But foreign stock or scrip shares, bought for the account day and not delivered before half-past two, may be bought in on the following day at half-past twelve, in which case the loss shall be borne by the person who shall not have delivered the stock or shares at half-past two o'clock on the settling day.

A member neglecting to take the numbers of bonds or shares not delivered in due course shall be required to trace out the responsible party.

110. The buyer of shares, bonds, obligations or other securities subject to periodical drawing by lottery or otherwise shall not be entitled to claim delivery of the same, previous to the day for which contract has been made. All such securities shall be taken and delivered as undrawn; and if after delivery any shall be found to have been drawn on or before the day of such delivery, the same shall be returned for the purpose of being exchanged for undrawn securities.

111. A member who shall allow three days to elapse without availing himself of his right of buying in, or without attempting to buy in scrip shares or bonds, releases the seller from any loss arising from the failure of any party through whose default the shares or bonds were not delivered, unless such right has been waived at the request or with the consent of the seller. The right to buy in shares or bonds is limited to the original buyer.

112. The clerk of the foreign market shall, at twelve o'clock on each of the two days preceding each foreign settling, fix the making-up prices of all foreign stocks and scrip shares, by taking the then actual market prices; and no making-up shall be binding unless at such fixed prices.

113. On every settling day, at three o'clock, the clerk of the foreign market shall (with the concurrence, if necessary, of a member of the committee) fix the prices of foreign stock and scrip shares, at which prices all undelivered stock shall be temporarily made up, and the differences paid in the usual manner.

Buyers of foreign stock or scrip shares shall pay for such portions as may be delivered before half-past two o'clock.

116. Foreign coupons sold at the fair exchange of the day, and not paid, are returnable with all reasonable expenses.

The secretary of the share and loan department shall, as interest or dividends become payable on foreign railway shares, fix a price for the coupons in sterling money, which price, when posted in the Stock Exchange, shall be adopted by the market.

117. Every bond or scrip share is to be considered perfect, unless it be much torn or damaged, or a material part of the wording be obliterated, and any dispute arising shall be left to arbitration. The committee will not take cognizance of any complaint in respect of bonds or shares alleged to have been delivered, deficient in, or with irregular coupons, should such bonds or shares be detained by the buyer more than three days after the delivery, unless it can be proved that the party passing them was aware of their being imperfect.

118. Bonds and debentures of railways in Great Britain, Ireland, and the East Indies, shall be dealt in so that the accrued interest, up to the day for which the bargain was done, be paid by the buyer; but bargains in bonds and debentures of colonial and foreign railways shall include the accrued interest in the price.

Settling Days and Quotation in the Official List of new Loans, Shares and Stocks.

120. The committee will appoint a settling day for transactions in shares of a new company, if no allegation of fraud or misrepresentation be substantiated, and provided sufficient scrip or shares be ready for delivery; but such settlement shall be special, and shall not apply to bargains made previously to complete delivery of the allotment letters; and no differences arising out of such bargains shall (under any circumstances) be allowed as claims against a defaulter's estate, nor shall any buying in or selling out for the settlement of such bargains be sanctioned or permitted.

Settling day, and quotation of companies.

The application for a settling day must, in the first instance, be laid before the secretary of the loan and share department, who shall give two clear days' notice to the Stock Exchange previously to its being submitted to the committee.

The committee will also order the quotation of such company in the official list upon the following conditions:—

That the company is of a bonâ fide character and of sufficient magnitude and importance.

That not less than two-thirds of the shares have been applied for by and allotted unconditionally to the public, and the deposit paid thereon (h); that in the event of the directors of a company having allotted, or it being their intention to allot, a portion of the shares without power to individual allottees of dealing with them at their discretion, the same shall be stated in the prospectus, with the number and amounts of the shares; (it being expressly understood that shares reserved for future issue, or granted to projectors, concessionnaires, or owners of property, in lieu of money payments, will not be considered as forming any portion of the two-thirds subscribed); and that shares to be granted to contractors for works to be executed must be specially so described, and will in no case be admitted by the committee as representing part of the subscribed capital if exceeding one fifth of the whole capital.

The application for a quotation must be accompanied by the following documents:—

The prospectus, with any evidence that may be required as to its correctness, and that the company, if a foreign one, is formed according to the laws of the country in which it originated.

An official certificate from the company, stating the number of shares applied for and allotted, the amount of deposits paid thereon, and the number of shares (if any) to be taken by contractors.

A certificate from the bankers of the company (accompanied by the pass-book), stating the amount of deposits received, and a complete list of the applications and allotments.

The secretary, in announcing to the Stock Exchange the settling day for the shares of a new company, shall state whether the company is "to be marked" or "not to be marked" in the official list.

121. Documents relating to the settlement or quotation of stocks or shares must be delivered to the secretary one clear day before the meeting of the committee, and the brokers (if any) of the contractor, agent or company shall give the committee such information as may be deemed necessary.

Brokers to attend when settling or quotation applied for.

122. The committee will not recognize transactions in the shares of a new company unless one-half of the nominal capital of the company be issued, and at least ten per cent. paid thereon.

New companies must have 10 per cent. paid on half nominal capital.

123. A company issuing, or promising to issue, new shares within twelve months after the first settling day appointed by the committee, unless under special circumstances, shall be liable to exclusion from the official list.

Companies issuing new shares within a year of first settlement not to be quoted.

124. Foreign railway or other industrial companies partly subscribed for and allotted in this country, shall not, unless under special circumstances, be allowed a quotation in the official list in the Stock Exchange until they have been officially quoted in the country to which they belong, or are marked on the Paris Bourse.

Quotation of foreign companies.

(h) Where the defendant and others forming the board of management of a company, for the purpose of getting the shares of the company inserted in the official list of the Stock Exchange, untruly represented, through their secretary, that two-thirds of the scrip had been paid upon and the shares were in consequence inserted in the official list, and the plaintiff, knowing this rule of the Stock Exchange, purchased shares on the faith that two-thirds of the scrip had been paid upon, and the jury found that the representation was fraudulently made, it was held that the defendants were liable to the damages sustained by the plaintiff, although the representation was not made to him directly. Bedford v. Bagshaw, 29 L. J., Exch. 59.

out companies.

125. The committee particularly caution brokers against giving the sanction of their names to the bringing out of any company without due inquiry as to the bona fides of its objects and the character of the promoters, directors, concessionnaires and other parties connected with it. Members disregarding this caution are liable to be dealt with in such manner as the nature of the case may demand.

Companies under the Limited Liability Act.

127. In settlements of shares of companies under the Limited Liability Act, when the allottees have signed articles of association, the delivery of shares must be by deed of transfer, and in cases where no such articles have been signed, and scrip certificates only have been issued, the committee will not fix a settling day, unless the scrip bear a stamp of one penny, and a limited period be stipulated in the scrip certificates for their registration.

Settling days in English and foreign stock, shares, &c.

128. The committee shall fix the settling day for English stock at least eight days previous to the settlement of the pending account; and those for foreign stock, shares, &c., for the succeeding month, at the first meeting of the committee in each month, of which the secretary shall give the usual notice.

III. Borrowed Capital.—1. Mortgages and Bonds.

Mortgages and bonds.

The company may, subject to the restrictions in the special act, and by order of a general meeting, borrow money on mortgage (i) or bond (k), and may mortgage the undertaking and the future calls on the shareholders: (8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, s. 38, App. 29.) If any mortgage or bond be paid off, it may be re-borrowed: (Sect. 39.) If, by the special act, money cannot be borrowed until a definite portion of capital is subscribed, or if the authority of a general meeting is necessary, the certificate of a justice is sufficient evidence of the first, and a signed copy of the order of a general meeting is sufficient evidence of the second, fact: (Sect. 40.) Mortgages and bonds must be by deed duly stamped, wherein the consideration must be truly stated (l), and forms are given in the act (m): (Sect. 41.) Holders of mortgages or bonds issued under the act are not entitled to any preference by reason of the priority of their mortgages or bonds, or of the meeting at which they were authorized. For by sect. 42, it is enacted, that:—

Rights of mort-

“The respective mortgagees shall be entitled one with another to their respective proportions of the tolls, sums and premises, comprised in such mortgages, and of the future calls payable by the shareholders, if comprised therein, according to the respective sums in such mortgages mentioned to be advanced by such mortgagees respectively, and to be repaid the sums so advanced, with interest, without any been illegally borrowed, and praying for a declaration that borrowing was illegal, and for an injunction to restrain the directors from repaying such sums out of the assets of the company; a demurrer was allowed on the ground that there was no allegation that half the money subscribed had not been paid up, nor that the defendants intended to issue bond or mortgages before it was due. Nowell v. Andover and Redbridge R. Co., 3 Giff. 112.

"That the respective obligees in such bonds shall, proportionally according to the amount of the monies secured thereby, be entitled to be paid, out of the tolls or other property or effects of the company, the respective sums in such bonds mentioned, and thereby intended to be secured, without any preference one above another, by reason of priority of date of any such bond, or of the meeting at which the same was authorized, or otherwise howsoever." Rights of obligees.

Although future calls on shares are mortgaged, the company may, nevertheless, receive and apply such calls: (Sect. 43.) A register of mortgages and bonds must be kept by the secretary; and all shareholders, mortgagees, and bond creditors may, at all reasonable times, peruse the same: (Sect. 45.) Mortgages and bond debts may be transferred by deed, and a form is given in the act (m) (sect. 46); and the transfer must be registered with the secretary, otherwise the company are not responsible to the transferee (n): (Sect. 47.) The interest on mortgages and bonds must be paid in preference to any dividends payable to the shareholders (sect. 48); the interest on any mortgage or bond is not transferable, except by deed duly stamped: (Sect. 49.)

The company may fix a time in the mortgage or bond for the repayment of the money, and at the period so fixed it becomes payable (o): (Sect. 50.) If no time be fixed, either party may give the other six months' notice, provided twelve months have elapsed from the date of the instrument. The mode of giving notice is prescribed in the act: (Sect. 51.) After the expiration of six months' notice, given by the company, all further interest ceases to be payable: (Sect. 52.) The following clause relates to the appointment of a receiver (p):—

(m) Post, App. 45. The transferee must sue the company in his own name, Vertue v. East Anglian R. Co., 5 Exch. 280; 19 L. J. (Exch.) 235. When a transfer, made for a special purpose, does not give title to a third party, see Norman v. Reid, 10 Ir. Law R. 207. By 16 & 17 Vict. c. 59, s. 14, to facilitate the transfer of bonds and mortgages given by public companies under Acts of Parliament, it is enacted, that "where on the original making and issuing of any such bond or mortgage as aforesaid, and before any transfer or assignment thereof, the same shall be stamped with an amount of stamp duty equal to three times the amount of the ad valorem stamp duty chargeable thereon by law, and over and above the said ad valorem duty, then every transfer or assignment thereafter made of such bond or mortgage by endorsement thereon, shall be deemed to be exempt from the stamp duty which would otherwise be payable in respect of such transfer or assignment. Provided always, that nothing herein contained shall extend to exempt any such transfer or assignment from any stamp duty to which it may be liable as a settlement of the money or stock secured by such bond or mortgage or any portion thereof." And see a similar provision as to transfers of mortgages and bonds granted by railway companies in Scotland, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 50.

(n) See Doe v. Jones, 5 Exch. 16. Whether this applies to transfers by act of law, as in cases of bankruptcy, see Lane v. Smith, 14 Beav. 49.

Appointment of a receiver.

"Sect. 53. Where by the special act the mortgagees of the company shall be empowered to enforce the payment of the arrears of interest, or the arrears of principal and interest, due on such mortgages, by the appointment of a receiver, then, if within thirty days after the interest accruing upon any such mortgage has become payable, and after demand thereof in writing, the same be not paid, the mortgagee may, without prejudice to his right to sue for the interest so in arrear, in any of the superior courts of law or equity, require the appointment of a receiver, by an application to be made as hereinafter provided; and if within six months after the principal money owing upon any such mortgage has become payable, and after demand thereof in writing, the same be not paid, the mortgagee, without prejudice to his right to sue for such principal money, together with all arrears of interest, in any of the superior courts of law or equity, may, if his debt amount to the prescribed sum alone, or, if his debt does not amount to the prescribed sum, he may, in conjunction with other mortgagees whose debts, being so in arrear, after demand as aforesaid, shall, together with his, amount to the prescribed sum, require the appointment of a receiver, by an application to be made as hereinafter provided."

An application for a receiver must be made to two justices, who, by order, may appoint some person to receive the whole or a competent part of the tolls or sums liable to the payment, until the principal or interest due has been recovered: (Sect. 54.) The books of account of the company are at all times open to mortgagees and bond creditors: (Sect. 55.) (q)

Remedies of specialty creditors.

Ejectment will not lie.

Having thus briefly stated the contents of the clauses in the Consolidation Act which relate to mortgages and bonds or debentures, we proceed to direct attention to some questions of great importance, which have been discussed in the courts, relative to the rights and remedies which are available to the creditors of railway companies. The subject embraces the rights of simple contract creditors who may obtain judgments against the company, as well as of specialty creditors—for, as we shall see presently, these two classes of creditors may be brought into collision. And, first, it was decided, on the construction of statutes containing nearly similar provisions to those in 8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, that the lands on which a railway is made do not pass by a mortgage of the undertaking, and the rates, tolls and other sums arising under the said acts, and that a mortgagee was not entitled to maintain ejectment; the Court saying that there was no reason to suppose that the Legislature intended so inconvenient a thing to the public and the company, as obliging the company to part with that property by which their undertaking was carried on (r).

portant to consider how far the clauses in the special acts override or control the provisions of the Consolidation Act. It is often extremely difficult to construe an act, so made up from different parts of other acts, partly repealed and partly not, and it has been necessary, on this account, to state the decided cases hereinafter mentioned at some length.

(q) The provisions of the Companies Clauses Act, 1863, with respect to additional capital and debenture stock are noticed, post, 148.

Again it has been decided that an action at law cannot be maintained against the company on the mortgage-deed, unless the deed contains words which amount to a covenant to pay the money. This was decided in Pontet v. Basingstoke Canal Co. (s), where Tindal, C. J., says,—

When an action at law may be maintained.

“These acts of Parliament are public acts, and they enable the company to raise the money upon the credit of the undertaking, and the rates or duties granted; and it is distinctly said that the creditors shall be creditors on the rates or duties, in equal degree one with another. This is not, therefore, a security which gives the plaintiff any right of action in a court of common law. It would be most destructive to the parties engaged if they were held to be so liable.”

With respect to bond creditors, however, it is to be observed that, by the form of the bond (t), the railway company bind themselves under the common seal, to pay the obligee a certain sum of money on a day named, and in such cases an action of covenant will lie on the bond (u). So if a mortgage deed stipulates that the money shall be repaid on a certain day, this amounts to a covenant that the sum shall be repaid on that day, and in such cases an action may be maintained at law to recover the money. This was decided in Hart v. Eastern Union R. Co., first by the Court of Exchequer (x), and afterwards affirmed on writ of error in the Exchequer Chamber (y). The case turned in part upon the construction of certain clauses in the special acts, which had reference to the powers given to specialty creditors to apply for the appointment of a receiver; and as the remarks made by the Court illustrate the operation of some similar clauses in the Consolidation Act above set forth, we transcribe a portion of this important judgment.

Hart v. Eastern Union R. Co.

It appeared that the special act authorized the mortgagees or bond creditors to require the appointment of a receiver; and, on behalf of the company, it was not denied that the instrument itself, on its face, imported a covenant by the company for the repayment of the money advanced upon a day therein named for the purpose, and that, apart from such consideration, the action would be maintainable; but it was contended, in the first place, that the company, unless enabled by specific statutory provisions, could not bind themselves by any such covenant, so as to give a right of action; and, secondly, that not only were there no such enabling clauses in the statutes relied on by the plaintiffs, but that these statutes gave other specific remedies for the recovery of the money advanced, to which alone recourse could be had. But the Court of Exchequer decided that the action would lie, and the judgment was affirmed in error in the following language:—

Judgment in the
Chamber.

“We are clearly of opinion, that where a corporation is created for certain purposes, with power to sue and be sued, to borrow money for the completion of those purposes, and to secure the repayment of such money by an instrument which, on its face, imports a covenant for repayment, if money be so borrowed and so secured, an action may be maintained against the corporation on a breach of the covenant. This appears to us a necessary inference from the premises just stated: and as all these premises concur in the present case, without a more specific examination of the sections of the various statutes, this is enough to dispose of the first point made by the plaintiffs in error. The second point will require a more detailed examination of the several statutes. By the mortgage, it appears that the money was borrowed under the powers of 10 & 11 Vict. c. ccxxv.; and money borrowed under that act is, by the 7th section, borrowed under the same or the like provisions as are contained in 8 & 9 Vict. c. xciv. This act, in section 6, enables the company to borrow on mortgage or bond, and, for securing the repayment of the money lent on mortgage or bond, to mortgage the undertaking as authorized by 7 & 8 Vict. c. lxxxv. To this act, therefore, we must look; and though by 10 & 11 Vict. c. clxxiv. it is, for general purposes, repealed, yet, for the purposes of our present inquiry, it is in full force. The 37th section of this act gives power to borrow and secure repayment by mortgage of the railway and future calls. The 49th section enables the company to fix the period for the repayment of the principal and interest, and in such case they are to cause a period to be inserted in the mortgage deed as they have done here; on the expiration of which period it is enacted that the principal and the arrears of interest shall be paid to the party entitled to the mortgage. It being undisputed that the money in question was borrowed under such circumstances in all respects as satisfied the conditions imposed by the Legislature, and that the instrument of security is in the form prescribed, it is clear, if the statute had stopped here, an action might have been maintainable; and this is very important in determining the construction of the sections to which we are now coming, and on which has arisen whatever difficulty has been felt by any member of the Court in the decision of this case. The plaintiffs in error contend that these, and these alone, give any right of action, and upon a condition not complied with. The defendants in error maintained that they give no right of action, but only recognize the pre-existing right, and add thereto another specific remedy, at the option of the borrower. These sections, 51 and 52, which may be read as one, commence with this preamble, ‘in order to provide for the recovery of the arrears of interest and costs, or of the principal and interest and costs of any such mortgage or bond at the respective times at which such principal and interest and costs become due.’ And the 52nd section, as to principal and interest and costs, enacts ‘that if the same be not paid within six months after the same has become payable, and after demand thereof in writing, the mortgagee or bond creditor may sue for the same in any of the superior courts of law or equity, or, if his debt amount to the sum of 5,000*l.*, he may alone, or if his debt does not amount to 5,000*l.*, he may, in conjunction with other mortgagees or bond creditors, whose debts being so in arrear after demand as aforesaid, shall, together with his, amount to 10,000*l.*, require the appointment of a receiver,’ &c. The 51st section had previously provided, that if the interest shall remain unpaid for thirty days after it shall have become due, and demand thereof shall be made in writing, the mortgagee or bond creditor may either sue in an action of debt, or may require the appointment of a receiver. Now as to both principal and interest, the 49th section, as we have just seen, provided that they should be paid at the expiration of the period named in the instrument of security. If, then, we hold the expiration of six months in one case, and thirty days in the other, after such period, are conditions precedent to any right to recover by action, either we make the sections inconsistent, or we must suppose a mere right has been declared by the former section, that is, a right to repayment on a day named for the purpose by the debtor, but no remedy to enforce it given until the thirty days, or six months later, with a superadded condition of a demand in writing. This, in itself, would be unreasonable; and the more so, because these terms certainly do not apply to the company, which is left at liberty to pay at a day named, at all events; a liberty which, considering how often such loans are made by way of investment, and how the value of money fluctuates in short periods of time, will, in many supposable cases, operate very inconveniently to the lender. Moreover, if we give this construction to the 49th section, we must do the same to the 50th, which provides for cases where no time has been fixed in the mortgage deed or bond, for the repayment of the money, and enacts that the lender may, at the expiration or at any time after the expiration of twelve months from the date of the mortgage or bond, demand payment of the principal with all arrears of interest on giving six months' previous notice for that purpose. It would be strange to hold, that when by six months' notice the money under this section had become payable at the end of twelve months, still that no action could be maintained till after six months' further default and demand in writing; yet this must be the consequence if we hold the right of action is given by the 51st and 52nd sections only. But this construction, which involves such difficulty, is not a necessary one. All the enacting words of both would receive a full and satisfactory meaning, if we suppose them to provide only and specifically for the case of default for thirty days or six months respectively after demand made in writing, and in either of those specified cases to enact that the company would be subject not only to an action, but at the option of the lender to have a receiver put upon them,—an arrangement which, whether advantageous or not to the lender, could not but be highly inconvenient to them. We agree with the Court below in thinking that this is the true construction of the sections, and it has the advantage of making them agree with the corresponding sections of the Companies Clauses Act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, ss. 50, 51, 52, and 53, which provide for the repayment of the money borrowed and interest where a time has been fixed, and where no time has been fixed in the instrument; and the last of which expressly gives a right to require the appointment of a receiver after thirty days or six months' default, as the case may be, and after demand in writing, without prejudice to the right to sue."

Hart v. Eastern Union R. Co.

Judgment in the Exchequer Chamber.

In a subsequent case, where an action at law was brought on a bond given by a pier company, and the condition annexed to the bond contained a reference to the provisions in the special act, to the effect that all the owners of such securities should be equally entitled to a claim or lien on the rents, rates, tolls and profits of the company, without any preference or priority, it was contended that an action was not the proper remedy for enforcing the claim of the obligee, for if he recovered in the action he might issue an elegit, and then seize the lands of the company; but the Court of Queen's Bench held, on the authority of Eastern Union R. Co. v. Hart, that an action would lie on the bond (z). But the learned judges all intimated that the effect of the statute might be such, as to restrain the plaintiff from issuing any execution, at least by elegit (a).

Rights of mortgagee paramount to those of judgment creditor.

Where it is clear from the language used in a mortgage that the land on which the railway is made is included (b), then it is clear that the rights of a judgment creditor are subordinate to those of the mortgagee, as the judgment creditor can only take the interest of his judgment debtor, and that interest is an equity of redemption only. He therefore takes subject to the mortgages (c).

And so where the mortgage is of rates and tolls, it would seem to be equally clear that the rights of a judgment creditor are subordinate to those of a mortgagee. But there is this difference in the case of a mortgage of rates and tolls, that rates and tolls being incorporeal hereditaments, it is necessary for a mortgagee to enter, in order to prevent the mortgagor or judgment debtor from receiving them, and consequently a judgment creditor might, if the mortgagee were not in possession, take rates and tolls in execution, by virtue of the attachment clauses in the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854; but as soon as a mortgagee thinks fit to take possession, the judgment creditor would be dispossessed, and could not take subsequent tolls (d).

In a suit in equity all the specialty creditors must be parties.

When mortgagees or bond creditors are driven to equity for relief, it appears to be a rule that all the specialty creditors must be made parties to the suit.

Thus, in Mellish v. Brooks (e), where a bill had been filed by a mortgagee of turnpike tolls, praying that a receiver might be appointed, to enable the plaintiff to recover his mortgage debt and interest, Lord Langdale, M.R., observes—

“As to the form of the suit, it is to be observed, that the tolls which are collected under the acts are the security to which the plaintiff and all other persons who have lent the money on the credit of the acts are entitled; that the plaintiff is one of several, and is entitled to the benefit of only a share of the tolls, namely, a share bearing such proportion to the whole, as the amount due to him bears to the aggregate amount of all the other sums borrowed on the credit of the tolls; and the question is, whether the plaintiff, in the absence of the other mortgagees, can sue alone for his share. He asks to be paid what is due to him out of the monies received or to be received under the acts of Parliament, and that a receiver of the same may be appointed; but the other mortgagees are interested in those monies, and the plaintiff cannot be paid in full without diminishing the fund out of which they are entitled to be paid; and, under these circumstances, I am of opinion, that, in this form of suit, the plaintiff is not entitled to the general relief which he prays" (f).

The same rule was held to be applicable in a suit instituted for the purpose of cancelling certain debentures, alleged to have been improperly issued by an incorporated company (g). But it seems to be a sufficient compliance with this rule for a mortgagee to file his bill on behalf of himself and all other mortgagees (h). And as on the one hand a plaintiff who has a right to complain of an act done to a numerous society, of which he is a member, is entitled effectually to sue on behalf of himself and all others similarly interested, though no other may wish to sue; so although there are a hundred who wish to institute a suit, and are entitled to sue, still if they sue by a plaintiff who has personally precluded himself from suing, that suit cannot proceed (i).

We have thus seen that actions at law may be maintained against railway companies, to recover monies secured by bonds or mortgages; and also that, in cases where the special act authorizes such a proceeding, the bond creditors and mortgagees may recover their debts, by applying to two justices to appoint a receiver, under the 54th section of the Consolidation Act; or the Court of Chancery may, if a proper case is established, appoint a receiver. If a receiver be appointed, it is obvious that questions of a very complicated nature may arise between judgment creditors and the receiver, after that officer is placed in possession of the company's effects.

In Russell v. East Anglian R. Co. (h), Lord Truro, C., delivered a very valuable judgment on this important subject. In that case, the first question his Lordship was called upon to decide was,—whether it was competent for the sheriff to enter and make a levy, under a judgment obtained by a simple contract creditor, whilst a receiver appointed by the Court of Chancery was in possession of the company's effects. It appeared that a bill had been filed by a bond creditor of the company, on behalf of himself and a certain class of bond creditors, under the special act, against the company and certain other bond creditors and mortgagees of the company, praying payment of the debts of the plaintiff and of the other bond creditors and mortgagees out of the estate of the company, according to their respective priorities, and for a receiver. A receiver was thereupon, by the consent of the defendants, appointed, and the receiver gave notice to the sheriff of his appointment, and that he was in possession; but the sheriff, disregarding the notice, enforced a writ of fieri facias,—seized the goods of the company, and called upon the receiver to interplead at common law with the judgment creditor. A judge at chambers adjourned the interpleader summons, until a motion made to the Court of Chancery, to commit the sheriff for contempt, had been disposed of, and Sir K. Bruce, V.C., having refused to accede to this motion, the parties appealed to the Lord Chancellor, and it was then contended on behalf of the sheriff, that the original order for the appointment of a receiver was invalid, and that it was competent for the sheriff on that motion, to impugn the order appointing the receiver. But Lord Truro, C., said, on this point:—

that the sheriff could not levy
when the receiver was in possession.

“The sheriff was wholly wrong in entering on the possession of the receiver, and he is not in a situation to make this defence. I have looked with care through the numerous authorities that have been cited. The result appears to be this, that it is an established rule of this Court, that it is not open to any party to question the orders of this Court, or any process issued under the authority of this Court, by disobedience. I know of no act which this Court may do, which may not be questioned in a proper form and on a proper application; but it is not competent for any one to interfere with the possession of a receiver, or to disobey an injunction, or any other order of the Court, on the ground that such orders were improvidently made. Parties must take a proper course to question their validity, but while they exist they must be obeyed. I consider the rule to be of such importance to the interests and safety of the public, and to the due administration of justice, that it ought on all occasions to be inflexibly maintained. In the present case it would have been perfectly open to the plaintiffs in the execution, to have applied to this Court to be heard pro interesse suo, or to have been heard on a summary application for leave to levy under their execution, notwithstanding the possession of the receiver. There is no instance in which justice may not be readily obtained, by persons who are supposed to have their rights interfered with by an order or process issued by this Court. Thus I find in one case (1), where a party wished to distrain for rent on property in the possession of a receiver, that the Court, being satisfied that the legal right of distress was paramount to the title of the party for whose benefit the receiver was appointed, allowed the distress to be made. I apprehend then it may be taken as a rule, that although this Court may have issued a process or have made an order which may interfere with the supposed rights and interests of other parties, not parties to the cause, it is always competent for such parties to make an application to the Court for relief, and it is not to be presumed or doubted but that justice will be duly administered to them, on that application. It seems to me, therefore, that the seizure in this case was made under circumstances that cannot be justified or excused; and I cannot account for those who acted on behalf of the sheriff, not being fully aware that if a receiver was in possession of the property, it was not competent to any person to disturb him; still less can I account for their attempting to call on the officer of this Court, to justify his proceedings in another Court. I therefore have no hesitation or difficulty in ordering that the sheriff and his officers do forthwith withdraw, and that they pay the costs of the application to the Court below: that will be without prejudice to any application that the sheriff or the plaintiffs in the execution may be advised hereafter to make."

Russell v. East Anglian R. Co.

This preliminary question having been thus disposed of, the execution creditors, availing themselves of the permission afforded to them, afterwards presented their petition, praying in the alternative—that the receiver might be ordered to pay to them their debt out of the monies of the company in his hands, or that they might be at liberty to enforce their judgment against the company, and that the sheriff might be at liberty to execute the writs of fieri facias. The petition stated that in March, 1849, the company became indebted to the petitioners for coke supplied, and that an action was brought to recover the debt, and in December, 1849, the company consented to a judge's order, making the debt payable with interest in June, 1850; that after the judge's order was drawn up, the directors, at a meeting of the company, and in concurrence with the bondholders, mortgagees, and certain of the simple contract creditors, presented certain propositions for the adoption of their shareholders, which, if assented to by the whole of the creditors, would have relieved the company from all suits until 1857, but that these propositions, though assented to by a large body of the creditors, were repudiated by petitioners; that default was made in payment of the amount agreed to be paid pursuant to the judge's order, and that thereupon final judgment was, on the 2nd July, 1850, signed in the action, and on the 3rd July a writ of fieri facias issued upon the judgment, directed to the sheriff; that various communications had taken place between the company and the petitioners, but there had not been any intimation given to them that a receiver had been appointed, or that the suit had been instituted, until several days after the writ had been lodged with the sheriff. The petition then stated the filing of the bill for a receiver, on the 20th June, 1850, and that the relief thereby sought was exclusively for the benefit of the bond and mortgage creditors of the company, and that the rights of the simple contract creditors were in no way thereby sought to be provided for, nor could they obtain payment of their claims in the suit, and that the suit was instituted for the express purpose of preventing the petitioners from obtaining the benefit of the judge's order, and that the company and the defendants had arranged to consent to an application to be made by the plaintiff for a receiver; that, on the 25th June, 1850, an order was made appointing the receiver, and on the 29th June, 1850, he took possession of all the moveable and other goods, chattels, estate, property, and effects of the company, and was still in possession. The petition concluded by stating that the receiver held sums of money more than sufficient to pay the petitioner's debt, and that all the capital of the company was fully paid up.

Upon these facts it was contended by the petitioners that the statutes did not create any lien in favour of the bond creditors and mortgagees, which could interfere with the legal right of the judgment creditors, and further, that the receiver mentioned in the special act was a receiver to be appointed by justices, under sections 53 and 54 of the Companies Clauses Act, and not a receiver to be appointed by the Court of Chancery. On the other hand, it was contended on the part of the specialty creditors, that they must be regarded as statutory mortgagees, and that persons dealing with railway companies had full notice that payment of their demands on the company must be subject to all prior statutory liabilities: further, that the bonds were equivalent to legislative bills of sale, and that a specific lien was created on the property of the company; and that a receiver appointed under the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act was for the benefit of the party having him appointed, but the receiver appointed by the Court of Chancery was for the benefit of all parties. After this important case had been argued for several days, Lord Truro, C., said:—

“The question in contest between these parties turns upon the construction of certain clauses in two acts of Parliament, namely, the Companies Clauses Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 16), and the special act under which the present company is established, the material sections being the 36th, 41st, 42nd, 43rd, 44th, 53rd, and 54th of the Companies Clauses Act, and the 32nd and 33rd sections of the special act. I have looked into all the authorities, but it will not be necessary, in order to explain the grounds of my judgment, that I should go through them. The petitioners complain that a receiver has been appointed in this suit by an arrangement between the parties to the cause; and the ground of their complaint is, that the effect of the arrangement was to surprise or mislead the Court, into making an order, for the express purpose of impeding the petitioners in their legal remedy: they insist that the plaintiff was not entitled to this order, and that the Court would not have made it, if the facts had been disclosed as they assert they ought to have been, and they, therefore, pray that they may be permitted to pursue their legal remedy, notwithstanding the existence of the order. The respondents, on the other hand, insist that the plaintiff was well entitled to the order, and that therefore there was no impropriety in the company giving their consent to that order being made; and they insist that they were well justified in expediting the proceedings for the purpose of intercepting the petitioner's execution for their own protection. Now the ground on which it is contended that the receiver was properly appointed is, that in this suit the plaintiff was a bond creditor of the company, and that the defendants appeared on behalf of themselves and the rest of the bondholders and mortgagees of the company. It is then insisted, that under the provisions of the act 8th Vict. c. 16, and the special act, the mortgagees and bond creditors acquired a specific equitable lien on the tolls, estate and effects of the company, and that the bill filed in this case and the appointment of the receiver, were proper and accurate proceedings with a view of enforcing and rendering effectual that security. There are thus two questions to be decided—the first being whether, upon the construction of the statutes which I have mentioned, a specific equitable lien is given to the mortgagees and bond creditors of the company, upon the estate and effects generally of the company; and the second whether, if upon the construction of these acts, no such lien is given, will or not the absence of such lien entitle the petitioners to any and what order on the present application. The principal clause on which the first question depends is the 44th section of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, the point being, whether a specific lien on the general effects of the company is thereby given. It will be observed that that section does not specify any particulars on which the lien is to attach; it says, generally, that the parties are to be entitled to be paid out of the tolls, property or effects of the company. Now, of course, if the parties were to be paid at all, they must be paid out of the tolls, property or effects of the company, for those were the only sources which could enable the payment to be made; it is, therefore, in effect saying that the company are to pay out of their means. There must, I conceive, have been a reason for inserting this clause; and, first of all, as to the mortgage creditors. The mortgagees having had certain rights given to them by the 42nd section, and the bond creditors having also had certain rights given to them, this 44th section, which applies to bond creditors, might have been intended, as it appears to me, rather to limit than to extend their remedies, for it might be intended to show that the bond creditors were not entitled to all the remedies which had been previously given to the mortgagees. Such might have been one of the objects for the insertion of the clause; but it must be construed in connexion with the 36th section of the same act, and the two sections must be taken together. The 44th section says, ‘the respective obligees of the bonds shall be paid out of the tolls or other property or effects of the company;’ the 36th section, which has a sort of preamble to it, to the effect that it is intended to apply to the general creditors of the company. We have thus one clause, stating that the bondholders are to be paid out of the tolls or other property or effects of the company, and another clause which says that creditors shall have the remedy of levying an execution against the property or effects of the company. These two sections are to stand together, but can they stand together consistently with the 44th section, giving an equitable lien which was intended to protect the estate, property and effects of the company against other creditors? I do not apprehend that it can be said that the 36th section, which is entitled as applicable to the remedies of creditors generally, must not be extended to mean mortgagees and bond creditors. The act is framed on steps: first of all it begins by the 36th section as to the remedies of creditors generally, not at all referring or limiting its operations to any particular class of creditors: then having dealt with the creditors of the concern generally, and given them a right to levy execution upon the property or effects of the company, also without limitation, (and if the argument on the part of the plaintiff be correct, there could be no property and effects of the company which could be properly amenable to an execution,) it then comes to the mortgagees and bond creditors, and it gives specific remedies to each of these classes of creditors. The meaning and intention then of the 44th section, I apprehend, was to prevent any argument that the rights and remedies of the bond creditors therein referred to, as having certain particular remedies, were limited to those remedies, and the effect of it was to show that the bond creditors were at liberty to pursue their legal or equitable remedies, if they had any, against the property or effects of the company, in common with all the general creditors of the company, as well as being entitled to any particular remedies which might be given to them in terms. Now, although it may not be very safe to argue upon any particular intent with reference to these clauses, yet it is to be remarked that a remedy given to the general creditors against the property and effects of the company, is inconsistent with the whole property and effects being made subject to a specific equitable lien, on the part of any particular class of creditors. It is obvious also that these companies cannot be carried on without large credit being given, and if so, the Legislature could never have intended to exclude the general body of creditors from all remedy for their debts, by giving a specific lien, on the whole estate and effects of the company, to a particular class of creditors. It is, however, said, that although there may be difficulty in contending that while the property remains in possession of the company, and is being used for the purposes of the company, it may not be dealt with notwithstanding the lien, yet that effect may be given to the plaintiff's construction of the act, by allowing the bond creditors or the mortgage creditors at any particular moment to assert their right, and that their right may be inchoate or in suspense until they have asserted it: but what a fraud it would be upon the general creditors to allow the company to contract largely upon the possession and apparent ownership of property, and then to give to the mortgage or bond creditors the opportunity of asserting their lien, when probably the general creditors had allowed the company to obtain on credit the largest portion of their stock! Such a right is not consistent with the general administration of justice, and with the safety and convenience of a commercial concern, which this to a great extent is. It appears to me also, when I look at the remedies, that none of the remedies which the act specifically provides are, for the reasons I shall state, at all applicable to the case supposed. One remedy given is by a receiver, and it is most material to attend to the manner in which that receiver is provided for. First, it will be observed, that the receiver who is mentioned in the act, when obtained, is not to oust any other remedy at law or in equity which the mortgagees or bond creditors may have. They may proceed at law, and get execution; and that looks as if there were something which was intended to be seized, independently of what the receiver was to take, namely, the tolls and sums of money, &c. Now the execution could only be levied on the chattels, and thus the bond creditors and mortgage creditors have this great advantage over the general creditors, that they have a fund which the general creditors cannot take, namely, the tolls and sums of money, &c., and may take also in common with the general creditors by an action at law, if an action is maintainable, as to which I do not think it material to inquire (m). It does not, however, appear to me consistent with the fact of giving a receiver over the property for a particular purpose, that the property should be already subject to a lien on the part of the class of creditors to whom the several remedies are given. It is also material to advert to the 54th section of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, which shows how the receiver is to be appointed by the justices, and points out what he is to do on being so appointed. In the first place, all the tolls and sums of money 'shall be paid to and received by the person so to be appointed, and the money so to be received shall be so much money received by or to the party to whom such interest, or such principal and interest, as the case may be, shall be then due, and on whose behalf such receiver shall have been appointed, and after such interest and costs, or such principal, interest, and costs, shall have been so received, the power of such receiver shall cease.' But it is said that by the 33rd section of the special act, which I shall come to presently, there is another receiver pointed at. Were there then to be two receivers,—a chancery receiver and a justices' receiver? If there were, I certainly should have expected some regulation, some clause or section by which to work out so anomalous a provision, but there is none. When, however, this 33rd section is looked at in connexion with the 53rd and 54th sections of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, it will be seen that the only receiver which is contemplated is the justices' receiver. Now the claim set up of a specific equitable lien, is so extraordinary as connected with property of this nature, that it is most unreasonable to suppose that the right to it should be left to be inferred from a mere statement that payment was to be made out of the estate and effects of the company. It is not likely that the acts of Parliament by which these companies are constituted, and which are framed by the companies themselves, should be so prepared by them, as to give the bondholder a lien on every spade or barrow which the company may possess. It would be a stigma on a company, inviting subscribers and before any credit in fact existed, to insert a clause into their act depriving them of the power to contract on credit. It is material, however, to turn to what has been mainly relied upon, namely, the 32nd section of the special act. The 32nd section provides that the respective mortgagees and bond creditors shall be entitled to be paid out of 'the tolls and other estate and effects of the company.' The 44th section of the Companies Clauses Act says, that the obligees of the bonds shall 'be entitled to be paid out of the tolls or other property or effects of the company.' What difference is there between these two clauses? the one is merely a re-enactment of the other. The 32nd section associates the mortgagees and bond creditors together; and, as to its operative part, directs that they are to be paid out of the tolls and other estate and effects of the company. The only difference thus is, that the mortgagees are added, and the word 'estate' is substituted for the word 'property,' which is the term used in the 44th section of the Companies Clauses Act; and that is a difference which I do not think applicable to the present case. I think the effect is generally to declare that the rights of the mortgagees and bond creditors are not limited to the specific remedy of a receiver given to them in the Companies Clauses Act, but that they are also to stand as general creditors entitled to all those remedies against the estate and effects of the company, to which other creditors are entitled. It appears to me, therefore, that an effect is sought to be given to the 32nd clause, which is by no means justified. Then comes the question with regard to the 33rd section of the special act, which has relation to a receiver. It enacts that it shall be lawful for the mortgagees and bond creditors to enforce payment by the appointment of a receiver; but not one word is said as to his duties, how he is to be appointed, how he is to be discharged, how long interest is to be in arrear, or what notice is to be given. The reason for this is obvious, that all these matters were contained in the 53rd and 54th sections of the Companies Clauses Act, and the clause in question does nothing more than supply certain blanks in those sections. These three sections, then, are to be taken as one and the same enactment. Now the 33rd section of the special act does not say how long interest is to be in arrear, (could it be intended that if it was one day in arrear, the remedies would arise); but the 53rd section of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act specifies thirty days. Then, again, the 33rd section of the special act does not say how long the principal is to be due before the remedy shall accrue; but the 53rd section of the Companies Clauses Act fixes the time at six months after the principal has become payable. So it is also to be observed, that in the 53rd section there is no sum mentioned for warranting an application for the receiver: the words there used are, 'if his debt amount to the prescribed sum,' referring to the special act, where the sum is to be filled up in each case; and the 33rd section of the special act here states it to be 25,000*l*. In short, taking any one of these sections abstractedly, it becomes quite useless. I therefore consider that the 33rd section of the special act does no more than give to the mortgagees and bond creditors the benefit of the 53rd and 54th sections of the Companies Clauses

Act, filling up those blanks which are essential to give them effect. It thus seems to me that there is no ground for contending that this clause (the 33rd) carries the remedy against the estate and effects of the company any further than was done by the previous clause (the 32nd). Now this bill is filed upon the equity of a supposed specific lien, and in the course of the argument it has been substantially, and I think in terms, shown, that if there was no such lien, there was no foundation for the bill. It appears to me that it is quite inconsistent with the whole purview of the special act, to suppose any such specific lien was intended to be given, and that therefore this bill has no equity upon which the remedy sought could be founded, and that the order which was made ought not to have been made, and would not have been made, if, instead of being obtained by arrangement between the parties to the suit, the Court had been made aware of all the circumstances. The Court at the time was not aware that the receiver which was asked for was asked for with the view, or would have the effect, of interfering with the rights or remedies of other persons."

His lordship concluded by making an order that the sheriff should be permitted to levy, unless the amount of the debt and costs should be paid into the Court of Chancery, to abide the further order of the Court, so that the parties might appeal to the House of Lords, if they thought fit, and he added:—

"The parties will also have the opportunity of considering whether it is desirable to adopt the suggestion I submitted to them, of turning the questions raised into a special case. Supposing that to be done, my judgment may be entered upon the special case, to the following effect; that is to say, that the estate and effects of the company were liable to be taken in execution at the time; that the order for the receiver ought not to have been made; and that the execution creditors ought to be permitted to levy notwithstanding that order."

cising borrowing

We shall now turn to a few principles which have been laid down, as to the mode in which borrowing powers may be exercised.

If money is borrowed by companies in a manner unauthorized by their acts of incorporation, the securities have no legal validity⁽ⁿ⁾. In 1844 a Committee of the House of Commons reported that large sums of money had been illegally borrowed by railway companies, on loan or mortgage, and that it was expedient that the practice should be discontinued for the future, but that the then existing securities should be confirmed. In pursuance of this report, the stat. 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85, enacted, that, from and after the passing of that act [9th August, 1844], any railway company issuing any loan-note, or other negotiable or assignable instrument, purporting to bind the company

(n) See the preamble to sect. 19, 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85, post, App. 23. As to the doctrine of estoppel, in cases where parties set up as a defence that a statute has been contravened, see Hill v. Manchester and Salford Waterworks Co., 2 B. & Ad. 544; Doe d. Chandler v. Ford, 3 A. & E. 649; Doe d. Levy v. Horne, 3 Q. B. 757; Doe d. Watton v. Penfold, ibid. 757. Where a dock company was authorized by the special act to raise money on the security of the tolls and other property, and the mortgages were directed to be registered, and the company mortgaged to a contractor a quantity of tools, machinery and materials, used on the works, but the securities were not made in the form required by the act, or registered, it was held that the mortgage was valid. McCormick v. Parry, 21 L. J. (Exch.) 143; 7 Exch. 355.

as a legal security for money advanced to a railway company, otherwise than under the provisions of an act of Parliament, should, for such offence, forfeit a sum equal to the sum for which the loan-note, or other instrument, purported to be a security. But it provided, that any company might renew any loan-note, or other instrument, issued by them prior to the passing of that act, for any period not exceeding five years from the passing of the same act (o).

And where any railway company, before the 12th July, 1844, had issued or contracted to issue any such loan-notes, or other unauthorized instruments, it is enacted that the company should pay off such loan-notes, or other instruments, as the same might fall due, subject as was thereinbefore provided; and until they should be so paid off, the loan-notes, or other instruments, should entitle the holders to the payment of the principal sum and interest (p). The secretary of every company is also required to keep a register of all such loan-notes, &c.; such register to be open to the inspection of certain interested parties (q).

The custom of Parliament to limit the amount of money which a railway company should be permitted to borrow, and to prescribe the conditions under which their borrowing powers should be exercised, has been recently and easily defeated by the issue of obligations (purporting to be for work done or materials supplied for the purposes of the undertaking), commonly called "Lloyd's Bonds." The holders of these bonds can sue upon them and recover judgment and issue execution against the companies, and are not hampered by the equality clauses contained in the ordinary mortgages and bonds (r). And there seems no reason to doubt the legal validity of Lloyd's Bonds when bonâ fide given to contractors or others for work actually done, as in fact they are nothing more than an acknowledgment under seal of a debt due for a bonâ fide consideration. But the power to issue them is, no doubt, liable to gross abuse, and the propriety and best mode of limiting such power has accordingly been the subject of grave consideration in Parliament, and will probably form the subject of legislation in the ensuing session. Last session the Select Committee of the House of Lords issued a report upon the subject, which, on 21st July, 1864, was ordered by the House of Commons to be printed (s).

Lloyd's Bonds.

Parliament for additional powers, issued bonds, payable at deferred periods, to contractors in anticipation of powers which they hoped to obtain, Wood, V.-C., held, that they had not done what was illegal or a fraud upon Parliament, although part of the bonds were issued for the purpose of raising money required to be deposited in pursuance of the Standing Orders on an application for a new bill (t).

Manchester and

But in another and subsequent case (u), where a company issued Lloyd's Bonds in order to discharge the liability of their chairman upon certain promissory notes signed by him to secure 10,000*l.* borrowed by the company to enable them to meet demands made, and to purchase part of the land required by them, it was held by the Court of Queen's Bench, in an action brought upon one of these bonds, that it was illegal, and that the plaintiff could not recover. The defendants were empowered by their special act to raise a capital of 550,000*l.*, and to raise by mortgage any further sum not exceeding 180,000*l.*, but no part of such further sum was to be raised until the whole of the capital had been subscribed for and one-half paid up. Part only of the capital was subscribed for; but the company determined to borrow 10,000*l.* for the purposes above mentioned. In giving judgment, Crompton, J., said,—

"I take the law to be exactly as it was laid down by Lord Wensleydale, in South Yorkshire R. and River Dun Co. v. Great Northern R. Co. (x), where he says, 'Generally speaking all corporations are bound by a covenant under the corporate seal properly affixed, which is the legal mode of expressing the will of the entire body, and are bound as much as an individual is by his own deed. Contracts with partnerships stand on a different footing. But corporations, which are creations of law, are, when the seal is properly affixed, bound just as individuals are by their own contract, and as much as all the members of a partnership would be by a contract in which all concurred.' That is undoubtedly true of corporations generally, and we shall see how he applies it to corporations created for special purposes. I entirely agree with what Mr. Lush says, that these railway companies are creatures of acts of Parliament, constituted for specific purposes, and we must look to see how far they are affected by provisions conferring upon them the powers of borrowing money, which they are said to have acted upon in the present case. Lord Wensleydale proceeds:—'But when a corporation is created by an act of Parliament for particular purposes, with special powers, then indeed another question arises, their deed, though under their corporate seal, and that regularly affixed, does not bind them if it appear by the express provisions of the statute creating the corporation, or by necessary or reasonable inference from its enactments, that the deed was ultra vires; that is, that the Legislature intended that such a deed should not be made.' That seems to me to touch the very question before us, and seems to show that if it appears from the act of Parliament, or by natural inference, that the deed is ultra vires, it is one which ought not to be made, and is invalid. The directors of these companies are in the position of special agents, and they have no power to affix the seal of the company to such deeds as are declared by the Legislature to be ultra vires, in such sense as having expressed that they are not to be made. I think that the corporation is bound by the seal being affixed to the deed where the directors have power given them so to affix it, but that it is not bound where the Legislature has said that the thing shall not be done. I cannot help agreeing with Mr. Lush, when he says that the Legislature intended that the company should have no borrowing powers except in the limited manner prescribed by their act of Parliament. Our attention has been called to 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85, s. 19"—[His Lordship read the section, and proceeded:]—"This implies that borrowing money in this way by these companies is unlawful, for the loan-note is not to be any security for the loan. Why should it not be such a security, except for the reason that the borrowing is illegal? The only doubt which can exist seems to arise upon the infliction of the penalty, and the act is so drawn that it might be argued that no penalty attaches unless the security is assignable; but I think that it means, if any loan-notes are issued the penalty attaches. The words of the act, as between borrower and lender, are strong to show that that is so, and that borrowing upon the security of loan-notes, or in any manner except such as is authorized by the act of Parliament, would be illegal. We come then to the special act in the present case, which gives power to the company to borrow 185,000*l.* on mortgage. Now, it is said that this does not touch the power of borrowing money on bond, or by simple contract; and that, by leaving out all mention of bonds, the Legislature has left to the company a larger power of borrowing money than it has given them of borrowing upon mortgage. Such a construction seems very strange. I agree with Mr. Lush, that the more natural construction is, that this is an enabling act, giving power to the company which it could not otherwise have possessed, and that the directors cannot borrow money in any other way. And this construction is recognized in 'The Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845,' which, by sect. 38, enacts, that, 'if the company be authorized by the special act to borrow money on mortgage or bond, it shall be lawful for them, subject to the restrictions contained in the special act, to borrow on mortgage or bond such sums of money, &c.,' which means that the special act was required to enable the company to borrow. The provision in this 8th section, when coupled with 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85, s. 19, impliedly prevents the company from borrowing money in any other way than by mortgage. If they could borrow on bond as they pleased, the provision empowering them to borrow on mortgage would be idle. There is, therefore, a special limited mode of borrowing, and the directors have no other powers. In Payne v. Mayor of Brecon (y) the difficulty did not arise, for there was no express power to borrow money for the particular purposes; and in White v. Carmarthen and Cardigan R. Co. (z), the bonds were given for a debt really due to the contractors, and which it might have been very proper to do, for companies may be unable at once to get the money required to pay the contractors, and then these bonds may be given to the contractors to enable them to raise money which is due from the company. It is the same as if the company say to the contractors, We are liable to you for work done, and we give you these bonds by way of payment for the work. In the case which was before the Master of the Rolls, Troup's case (a), there was no prohibition against paying in this way, and no illegality. Upon the facts of the present case, it appears that the bonds were sealed for the purpose of borrowing money upon them, in order that the plaintiff might be able to discharge the liabilities which were thrown upon him, and in substance it was the same as issuing a loan-note, and the whole transaction was tainted with illegality, for it was clearly prohibited by the act of Parliament."

Blackburn, J.—"I am of the same opinion. The principle was clearly laid down by Lord Wensleydale in the judgment already referred to. My opinion is based upon this, that the Legislature intended such a bond should not be made, and I think that the defendants have a good defence in law. If it was so only in equity, it would, perhaps, be necessary to take some more time to consider before delivering our judgment, but it is a defence in law. This is the case of a railway company created by a special act of Parliament, and subject to a series of general acts created for special purposes, and when I look at 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85, s. 19, together with 8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, s. 38, and section 8 of the special act, which are the principal sections upon which the question turns, I come to the conclusion that the Legislature meant that the company should not borrow money except in the way authorized by the special act. The whole scheme points to the fact of borrowing being prohibited. Such instruments as these are may be of use in this way, that when the company are actually indebted to a contractor it may be very convenient to make a bond pointing to a particular part of the debt, and it might very considerably facilitate the assignment in equity of the debt thus acknowledged to be due, and possibly it might throw upon the company the onus of proving that the debt did not exist. But if there be no actual debt such an instrument cannot create one, and the holder could not recover upon it, though he bonâ fide believed that there was a debt. When one reads the resolution, it is clear beyond all doubt that these bonds were given as a security for money lent, and that the original loan of 10,000*l.* was one to the company, and that the money was not raised by means of a mortgage. The plaintiff had become security for the money borrowed, and the bank had a right to come upon him when the note became due, but he could not recover it as money paid to the use of the company, for the company had not authorized it, and he only paid it to discharge the loan. The bonds were sealed in pursuance of the resolution of the 26th of May, to which the plaintiff was a party, and they were delivered to him in order that he might raise the money upon the security of them. There is nothing to support a legal claim for the money, and no action lies upon the bonds which were given as a security, and the rule must be made absolute to enter a nonsuit. My brother Shee requested me to say that, so far as he had heard the case, he had come to the same conclusion."

A mortgage or bond, executed in blank, without the name of the obligee or mortgagee, is void, and parties whose names are subsequently inserted cannot recover at law against the parties who so executed the instrument (b). And where a company agreed to sell shares to a party on condition that as soon as they were paid up in full they would give debentures in exchange, provided they were in a condition legally to do so, the contract was held to be illegal, and a decree for specific performance was refused on the ground that the company were not, at the time of the contract, authorized to raise money by issuing debentures (c).

L. J. (Ch.) 366. But the Court of Queen's Bench held that the purchaser was liable to pay the calls on the shares, after his name was placed on the register. West Cornwall R. Co. v. Mowatt, 15 Q. B. 521; 19 L. J. (Q. B.) 478.

Where a company, authorized by an act of Parliament to raise money for certain purposes, gave a bond purporting to be for a sum borrowed and advanced conformably to the act, a plea that it was executed colourably, and that the money was not in fact borrowed or lent for the purposes of the statute, as the obligee well knew, was held bad, no fraud or injury done to the shareholders of the company being shown (d). And in a similar case, where the obligors pleaded that the money was not borrowed for the purposes of the act, that they were not authorized to make the bond, and that it was made contrary to the provisions of the special act, of which the obligee had notice, it was held, that the plea was bad, for there was an estoppel as to all the facts recited in the bond, unless it was shown that the bond was made for a distinct illegal purpose (e). So it is no answer to an action at law, brought by the assignee of a bond, to allege that the bond was given by the defendants to the assignor, by reason of a fraud which had been practised on third parties, and to whose nominees the defendants were bound to give the bond (f).

Pleas to actions on mortgages and bonds.

Where, under the terms of a settlement, the trustees had authority to invest money in any of the public stocks or funds of this kingdom, or on real securities, it was held to be a breach of trust to invest the trust funds in railway debentures. Sir J. Romilly, M. R., on this point said—

When it is a breach of trust to lend trust monies on railway securities.

"I cannot consider this a proper investment, or such a one as, under the power in this settlement, ought to have been made. Assuming this to be a real security, it is not sufficient for a trustee to say so, and rely upon that as his defence. It is his duty to consider the nature of the property and the conditions upon which it is held. It might possibly be involved in litigation, or subject to liabilities which may prevent its being an available security; and in this very case the security, under the provisions of the act of Parliament for making the railway, cannot be enforced in the ordinary manner in which real securities are made available. No ejectment can be brought, neither can any foreclosure be obtained. Repayment cannot be demanded for eight years; the security may be sold, but the value is diminished by the enjoyment being made reversionary, and the parties entitled in possession before the time of payment. In all respects, therefore, it was a breach of trust; and the practice of conveyancers confirms this; and in modern settlements, powers are introduced to invest the trust funds upon railway debentures" (g).

Where, however, executors or trustees find among their testator's property railway mortgages or debenture stock, they are not neces-

loan into capital.
8 & 9 Vict. c. 16
(Appendix 24.)

With respect to the conversion of borrowed money into capital, the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, enacts, that, if it be not otherwise provided by the special act, the company may raise the additional sum authorized to be borrowed by creating new shares instead of by borrowing, but such augmentation of capital must be authorized at a general meeting of the company: (Sect. 56.) Such additional capital is subject to the same provisions as to payment of calls, &c., as the original capital, except as to the time and amount of the calls, which may be fixed by the company: (Sect. 75.) If the old shares are at a premium, then, unless it be otherwise ordered by the special act, the new shares must be offered to the shareholders in proportion to their existing shares, such offer to be made in the manner prescribed: (Sect. 58.) Such new shares vest in the shareholders who shall accept them and pay the instalments due thereon, and if any shareholder fails for one month to accept them (i), or pay the instalments, the company may dispose of them: (Sect. 59.) If the old shares are not at a premium when the capital is augmented, the company may issue the new shares on such terms as they think fit: (Sect. 60.)

Decisions as to the exercise of an option to take new shares.

Where a railway company resolved to raise money upon loan-notes, payable at the end of five years, with an option to the holders to convert them, at the expiration of three years, into shares, under the powers of an act, to be applied for as early as possible, and the company advertised for tenders, one half of the loans to be paid to the company when the tenders should be accepted (February, 1842), one quarter on or before the 15th of April, and the other quarter on or before the 15th of July following, it appeared that the loan was made by various persons, to whom, on the payment of the last instalment (July, 1842), loan-notes were delivered, promising to pay the sums expressed therein on the 15th of February, 1847, with an indorsement thereon referring to the resolution, and intimating that in pursuance thereof application was intended to be made to Parliament for an act, under the terms of which the bearer would be entitled, on the 15th of February, 1845, provided previous notice was given, to convert the loan-notes into shares, at the price mentioned in the resolution. An act was afterwards obtained, enabling the company to issue new shares of such amount, &c., as by the order of a meeting of the company should be determined. By a meeting subsequently held, it was resolved, that the new shares authorized by the act should be raised and allotted to and amongst the holders of loan-notes, in the manner and upon the terms directed by the act. Upon these facts, Sir J. Wigram, V. C., decided that the effect of the act, and the subsequent resolution of the company, was not to allot the new shares amongst all the loan-note holders unconditionally, but only as they had acquired a right to such allotment by virtue of their antecedent contract. Also, that the term of five years, at the end of which the notes were to be paid off, must be reckoned from February, 1842, when the first instalment of the loan was advanced, and that the three years, during which the holders were to have the option of converting the notes into shares, must be reckoned from the same time. And further, that from the nature of the property which was the subject of the option, time was of the essence of the contract (k).

Option to convert loan-notes into shares.

In another case, where a company resolved that every proprietor registered in the company's books, and also every holder of any scrip receipts who should deliver up the same, on or before the 10th day of August next, to be duly registered, should have the option of subscribing for one new share, in respect of every five shares which every such proprietor might then, or which every such scrip holder might, on the said 10th day of August, have registered in their respective names; and that the shares which should not be subscribed for under the option allowed by the above condition should be allotted by the directors to those proprietors who might, on or before the said 10th day of August, apply for any such shares, pro ratâ according to the number of shares so applied for by each proprietor, and it appeared that one of the registered proprietors, who was resident at Naples, was not apprized of the resolutions until the 12th of August, but on that day he wrote to the secretary of the company, declaring his option to take his proportion of the new shares; Sir L. Shadwell, V. C., was of opinion that the time fixed by the resolutions was final, and consequently that the plaintiff's declaration was too late to entitle him to claim the shares (l).

The Great Western R. Co. were authorized by act of Parliament to subscribe for 17,500 shares in the Metropolitan R. Co. These shares were taken by nominees of the G. W. R. Co. By a subsequent act the M. Co. were authorized to raise additional capital by the creation of new shares. At a general meeting of the M. Co. it was resolved that these shares should be allotted rateably among the holders of original shares. It was held by Wood, V. C., that neither the G. W. R. Co. nor their nominees were entitled to any new shares, as the G. W. R. Co. had no power to take the shares and would not be liable to calls (m).

The Companies Clauses Act, 1863 (n), which applies to companies authorized by special act passed after 28th July, 1863, and incorporating that act, contains some important provisions relating to "additional capital," that is, new ordinary shares or stock, and preference shares or stock; and also relating to "debenture stock," which includes mortgage preference stock, and funded debt (o).

But as the act itself is to be found at length in the Appendix it is not thought necessary to refer further to its provisions in this place.

I. *Powers to take and purchase Lands.*1. By Agreements made before the Act is obtained.

WE shall first treat of contracts to take lands, entered into by railway companies under their permissive powers, and the subject naturally divides itself into two branches, i. e. first, where the contracts are made before the special act for making the railway is obtained; and, secondly, where they are made afterwards. The first branch has been fruitful of litigation, as we shall see upon an investigation of the authorities.

In the early days of railways it was frequently held, in conformity with a previous decision of Lord Eldon (a), that agreements made by landowners with promoters of railway companies to sell their lands, and to withdraw or withhold opposition to a bill in Parliament, were not illegal, either as being a fraud upon the legislature or other landowners, or as being contrary to public policy; and landowners recovered from companies large sums of money which had been agreed by promoters to be paid them as the price of their land, with a view to secure the withdrawal of their opposition to such bills (b). And it was also held, that the fact of the landowner being a peer or member of Parliament did not render an agreement for the sale of his land at an exorbitant price the less valid, as such persons have as much right to sell their land for the highest price they can get as other people; though, of course, a substantive agreement by a member of the legislature to take money for his vote would be illegal (c).

Moreover, Lord Cottenham considered, that the company, when established under an act of Parliament, are entitled to all the rights, and subject to all the liabilities of the projectors, and ought to be regarded in equity as the successors and assignees of the projectors; and he more than once held, that the company were so far bound by agreements entered into by the promoters or provisional committee or other agents, previous to or during the progress of the bill through Parliament, that he granted injunctions to restrain companies, when incorporated, from exercising powers acquired through the medium of such agreements, without carrying the whole agreements into effect (d). And his decisions were for some time acquiesced in and followed by other judges, and even elicited expressions of approbation in the House of Lords. But of late years doubts have been thrown upon those decisions, which must therefore be considered to be somewhat shaken, though they have not hitherto been expressly overruled. These doubts are founded chiefly upon the ground, first, that the company when incorporated are not in fact the successors or assignees of the promoters, but generally consist of shareholders who were neither themselves the promoters, nor in any way connected with the promoters of the act, but became subscribers to the funds of the company after incorporation, upon the faith of the act of Parliament, which makes no allusion to any agreement entered into by the promoters; and to hold such subscribers bound by agreements entered into before the act was passed, and not mentioned in the act, would be a fraud upon them, as well as upon the legislature and other landowners, (as indeed was contended in the early cases): and, secondly, that the carrying out such agreements, by the payment of money out of the funds of the company when incorporated, is a misapplication of the funds of the company, and ultra vires. It cannot be denied that there is very great weight in these objections, and it would therefore seem that the only prudent course for a landowner, who is opposing a railway bill, to take, is either to obtain such an agreement as shall be personally binding upon some existing company, or individuals of responsibility, or else to try and get a clause recognizing his claim to compensation inserted in the act of Parliament, before he withdraws his opposition: though the insertion of such a clause is unusual. It will not be wise for him to rely on the chance of the company, when incorporated, adopting any agreement into which he may enter with the promoters (e), and even if the company does adopt such an agreement, it may turn out to be ultra vires and void: if intra vires of the company it may be binding on them. The arguments in favour of holding the company when incorporated to be bound by agreements entered into by the promoters or provisional committee are stated by Lord Cottenham in Edwards v. Grand Junction R. Co. (f); whilst those against holding the company liable are to be found in the judgments of Lord Cranworth in the House of Lords in Preston v. Liverpool and Manchester Junction R. Co. (g), and Caledonian and Dumbartonshire Junction R. Co. v. Magistrates of Helensburgh (h). They are of so much importance, that no apology is required for inserting them at some length.

How far contracts made by promoters are binding on company.

In Edwards v. Grand Junction R. Co., Lord Cottenham, C., said:—

“The railway company contend that they being now a corporation are not bound by anything which may have passed, or by any contract which may have been entered into by the projectors of the company, before the act of incorporation.

(h) 2 M.Q. 391. In Leominster Canal Navigation v. Shrewsbury and Hereford R. Co., ubi supra, Wood, V. C., speaking of this case, said, “That decision has only gone to this extent, that that which the directors could not do after the formation of the company, certainly the provisional directors could not do before, for the purpose of binding the company. You cannot spend by anticipation before the act the money of your shareholders, for purposes for which afterwards you could not spend it, and which any single shareholder would have the option of restraining you from doing.”

Rule laid down by Lord Cot-tenham, C., in

If this proposition could be supported, it would be of extensive consequence at this time, when so much property becomes every year subject to the power of these incorporated companies. The objection rests upon grounds purely technical, and those applicable only to actions at law. It is said that the company cannot be sued upon the contract, and that the agent entered into a personal contract, undertaking to procure from the company, when incorporated, a similar contract. It cannot be denied that the act of the agent was the act of the projectors of the railway; it was, therefore, the agreement of the parties seeking an act of incorporation that, when incorporated, certain acts should be done. The question is not whether there be any binding contract at law, but whether this Court will permit the company to use their powers under the act, in direct opposition to the arrangement made with the trustees before the act, and upon the faith of which they were permitted to obtain such powers. If the company and projectors cannot be identified, still it is clear that the company have succeeded to, and are now in possession of all that the projectors had before. They are entitled to all their rights and subject to all their liabilities. If any one individual had projected such a scheme, and in prosecution of it had entered into an arrangement, and then had sold and assigned all his interest in it to another, there could be no legal obligation between those who had dealt with the original projector and such purchaser; but in this Court it would be otherwise. So here, as the company stand in the place of the projectors, they cannot repudiate the arrangement into which such projectors have entered; they cannot exercise the powers given by Parliament to such projectors in their corporate capacity, and at the same time refuse to comply with those terms, upon the faith of which all opposition to their obtaining such powers was withheld.

“ The case of East London Waterworks Co. v. Bailey (i) was cited to prove that save in certain excepted cases the agent of a corporation must, in order to bind the corporation, be authorized by a power of attorney; but it does not therefore follow that corporations are not to be affected by equities, whether created by contract or otherwise, affecting those to whose position they succeed, and affecting rights and property over which they claim to exercise control. What right have the company to meddle with the road at all (k)? The powers under the act give them the right, but before that right was so conferred, it had been agreed that the right should only be used in a particular manner. Can the company exercise the right without regard to such an agreement? I am clearly of opinion that they cannot; and having before expressed my opinion that the contract is sufficiently proved, it follows that the injunction granted by the Vice-Chancellor is in my opinion proper, and that this motion to dissolve it must be refused with costs.

“ The case of Vauxhall Bridge Co. v. Earl Spencer (l) was cited for the trustees, and it certainly is a strong authority in favour of their claim; Lord Eldon having in that case expressed an opinion that the withdrawing opposition to a bill in Parliament might be a good consideration for a contract, and having recognized the right of an incorporated company to connect itself with a contract made by the projectors of the company before the act of incorporation. On the other hand, Dance v. Girdler (m) was cited for the railway company, but that was an attempt to make a surety liable beyond his contract; and Sir James Mansfield in his judgment in that case relied much upon the want of identity between the society with

(i) 4 Bing. 283.

(k) The great struggle in the case was upon the question whether a bridge to a turnpike-road over a railway should be fifty or thirty feet wide. The agreement was, that it should be the same width as the turnpike-road, which was fifty feet; whilst the act said it should be not less than fifteen feet wide.

whom the contract was made and the corporation; and the question there was as to a legal liability, not as to an equitable right.

Edwards v. Grand Junction R. Co.

"It was contended for the railway company, that to enforce this equity would be unjust towards the shareholders of the company who had no notice of the arrangement. To this two obvious answers may be made; first, that the Court cannot recognize any party interested in the corporation, but must look to the rights and liabilities of the corporation itself⁽ⁿ⁾; and secondly, that there is nothing in the effect of the injunction inconsistent with the provisions of the act; for although the act provides that bridges shall not be less than fifteen feet in width, it does not provide that they shall not be made wider. The company might under this act clearly agree that this or any other bridge should be fifty feet wide."

In Preston v. Liverpool, Manchester, &c. R. Co. (o), Lord Cranworth, in allusion to that judgment of Lord Cottenham, said:—

"The process of reasoning whereby Mr. Preston seeks to charge the company is this: He says, 'I entered into a contract with the projectors of the company, and consequently I have a right to assume that by my withdrawing my opposition, they succeeded in inducing the legislature to constitute this company; and the company therefore comes in esse cum onere, and must take existence with that burden attached to it, and must fulfil this amongst other contracts.'

"In the able argument which was addressed to us by the learned Solicitor-General, that doctrine was very much questioned, and had it been necessary upon the present occasion fully to make up my mind on the subject, whether that doctrine is correct or not, I should have desired much further time for consideration. I am aware that that is a doctrine which was acted upon by Lord Cottenham; and the Solicitor-General, indeed, endeavoured to explain some of the cases to show that he had not quite gone that length. I confess I think it must be taken, that that doctrine has been acted upon in a great many cases by Lord Cottenham, and it has been acted upon in so many cases, that it would be very inexpedient, off-hand, to say that that doctrine cannot be sustained when one considers how much may have been done upon the faith of it. I must, however, own that when the subject comes to be closely examined, I think there are objections of the gravest nature to its adoption, objections which do not seem sufficiently to have pressed upon the mind of his lordship. Lord Cottenham acted upon this principle, that the railway company was the successor of the projectors, or the assignee, if one may say so, of the projectors, and must take existence, subject to the burdens which had been contracted for by those who were the promoters of it, and to whom it owed its existence. It is manifest that that doctrine is open to great objections, for when a company is incorporated by act of Parliament, hundreds, I may say thousands, of persons from all parts of the kingdom come and purchase shares upon the faith that the act of Parliament tells them what their liabilities are; and in what position are they placed, when upon looking for their dividend they are told, 'You can have no dividend because contracts to the amount of a million (for it might go to that extent) have been entered into to pay persons sums of money which will come out of your capital, and subject to which obligations you own your existence?' The answer that may be made to that is, 'I have had no notice of that; I see in the act of Parliament, which is my title deed, that there is no allusion to anything of the sort.'

"Now and then there is on the face of an act of Parliament a stipulation that the lands of Mr. Johnson or Mr. Jackson are not to be taken without such and such stipulations. Of course no complaint can be made when that is found, but I must say that the complaints which may really and seriously be made by persons in respect of their being bound by contracts not apparent upon the face of the act of Parliament are formidable to the last degree. Observe, my lords, to what this doctrine leads. There is that case of Lord Petre, at which everybody starts when he hears it, in which there was a contract entered into by the projectors of a company, that if Lord Petre would withdraw his opposition, they would pay him 120,000*l.* for that which was not worth above 4,000*l.* It may be that some of those who purchased the shares of that company were aware of that contract; but in all probability that was not the case with the majority. If this might be done once, as in the case of Lord Petre, it might have been done with ten other landed proprietors, and there would have been above a million of the capital of the subscribers contracted away from them without any sort of knowledge upon their part, and for purposes quite foreign from those for which they subscribed. I, however, only point out this because there may be considerations which may outweigh those which I have now mentioned, and it may be when the matter comes to be looked into more closely, notwithstanding all those formidable objections, that Lord Cottenham's view of the case is the correct one; at all events, having been acted upon so long, it may be inexpedient hastily to depart from it. If, therefore, this case had turned upon the validity or non-validity of that doctrine, I should have desired of your lordships further time to consider as to the course which was to be taken, but it does not."

His lordship then proceeded to examine the contract in question, and showed that it was conditional on the railway being made, and proceeded to say:—

"I do not hesitate to say that even adopting Lord Cottenham's doctrine, and supposing contracts made by projectors are afterwards to be binding upon companies, still that doctrine cannot apply here; it can only be that contracts which the railway company might lawfully have entered into after the company had been formed, shall be binding if they were entered into by those who might be considered as agents for the company before the company came into corporate existence."

"In another case (p), Lord Campbell stated that a contract like this would have been ultra vires. That is very high confirmation of the doctrine I am now declaring; but I cannot hesitate to say, even if Lord Campbell had stated nothing of the sort, that I should have had no possible doubt that it is ultra vires of a corporation, established for the purpose of applying the funds of its subscribers in making a railway, to enter into a covenant to pay 5,000*l.* to a person for not opposing them in Parliament. To do so is entirely beyond the powers intended to be conferred, or that ever were conferred, upon the directors of a railway company. I state this because I have no wish to shrink from giving that as my opinion. I go entirely upon the other ground as to the construction of the agreement here."

Again, in Caledonian and Dumbartonshire Junction R. Co. v. Magistrates of Helensburgh (q), his lordship said:—

"The important question raised in this case is, whether the appellants can be compelled to perform the engagement entered into by the committee of management, on behalf of the projected company, before it had actually come into existence.

(p) Eastern Counties R. Co. v. Hawkes, 5 H. L. C. 356; Gage v. Newmarket R. Co., 18 Q. B. 469.

(q) 3 M'Q. 891. This judgment was much considered and very long delayed on account of a suggestion that Preston v.

Liverpool, &c. R. Co., then before the House, might involve similar points; but it did not ultimately do so. Lord Brougham concurred in Lord Cranworth's judgment, 2 M'Q. 422.

*Caledonian, &c.
R. Co. v. Magistrates of Helens-
burgh.*

"On behalf of the respondents it was argued, that, though the agreement in question was not entered into by the appellants themselves, that is, by the railway company, yet it was entered into by a committee of management, formed for the object of obtaining the act of Parliament by which the appellants were afterwards incorporated, and so that on principle as well as on authority the appellants are bound to implement what the committee had so undertaken to do.

"Suppose this question not to be settled by the authority of previous decisions, I cannot think that the proposition thus put forward by the pursuers below can be supported. It proceeds on the ground that the committee of management ought to be treated in the nature of agents for the company which owes its existence to their exertions; and that when the company came into being, it was from its very birth (so to say) bound to fulfil the contracts by which its projectors had stipulated that it should be bound.

"This reasoning rests on the assumption that a railway company, when established by Parliament, is in substance, though not in form, a body succeeding to the rights and coming into the place of the projectors. On no other hypothesis can such a company be bound by engagements to which it was not a party. It therefore becomes necessary to consider whether this is a true view of the relative positions of a company established by the legislature and of the persons, whether called a committee of management or provisional committee, or a body of projectors, who have applied to and obtained from Parliament the act constituting the company. When such a body apply for an act of incorporation, what they ask for of the legislature is not an act incorporating and giving powers to those only who are applying—not necessarily even incorporating and giving powers to any of them—but an act incorporating all persons who may be willing to subscribe the specified sums and so to become shareholders in the company. If the legislature accedes to such an application, the act when passed becomes the charter of the company, prescribing its duties and declaring its rights; and all persons becoming shareholders have a right to consider that they are entitled to all the benefits held out to them by the act, and liable to no obligations beyond those which are there indicated. If this be not the true principle, the legislature might be making itself ancillary to serious injury. When a capitalist, believing in the probable success of any particular project sanctioned by the legislature, is satisfied with the terms of incorporation embodied in the act, he reasonably advances his money on the faith of those terms; and if the project turns out a failure he has no right to complain. The speculation was one as to the prudence of which he had the means of judging, and no injustice is done to him if in the result he sustains a loss.

"But surely the case is very different, if behind the terms of incorporation expressed in the act, there are others of which the public have no notice, but which are to be held equally binding on the shareholders as if they had formed part of the charter of incorporation. If such secret or unexpected terms are to be held binding on those who take shares, the result may be ruinous to those who act on the faith of what appears on the face of the legislative incorporation. The principle on which all railway acts, and acts of a similar character, proceed, is to specify the sum to be raised and the shares into which the funds of the company are to be divided, to incorporate the shareholders, and to prescribe the objects to which the funds are to be applied. It is inconsistent with the policy of such acts to hold that there can be any other terms binding on those who subscribe their money, beyond what appears on the face of the act itself.

"Not only is such a doctrine calculated to occasion injury to shareholders, but it

*Caledonian, &c.
R. Co. v. Magis-

may often be a fraud, or, at all events, a surprise on the legislature. The statutory powers are given on the faith of the terms apparent on the act itself. It may well be that the additional terms, if communicated to Parliament, would have prevented the passing of the act at all.

“Special terms as to particular cases or particular persons are often made the subject of special clauses, and then neither the legislature nor any person taking shares can complain. The whole truth is disclosed. The legislature sanctions the special provision and the shareholder purchases his shares with full notice of the exceptional enactment. I know that it is said to be a common practice, sanctioned by committees of both houses when these bills are before them, not to insist on the insertion of these special and private clauses at the instance of persons alleging grounds for their introduction, if agreements between the promoters and the persons asking for the special clauses are entered into, whereby the promoters engage that the company when incorporated shall give to those who are asking for special enactments the same benefit, as if there were clauses in the bills to the effect asked for. That may be. Of the propriety of such a practice I am not bound to say anything. But the question is what is the effect of such arrangements? Do they bind the future company, or those who enter into the agreement? I need hardly say that the practice of committees cannot alter the law of the land, and I confess I can discover no principle, legal or equitable, whereby such contracts can be held to be obligatory on the company.

“And here I must remark that I cannot accede to the argument that the distinction between the company and those who may previously to its formation have entered into contracts purporting to bind it, is one of a technical nature or calculated to occasion substantial injustice to any one. The suggestion that the distinction is one of a technical nature, proceeds on the fallacy that the company are substantially the same persons as the projectors, only embodied in a new form. This is not so. Probably, though not certainly, the projectors may be among the shareholders, but the great bulk of the shareholders will always be persons who have taken shares on the faith of the act after it has passed or in its progress through Parliament, and who know nothing of what is not apparent on the face of the act.

“In holding that the company is a body different from its projectors in substance as well as in form, I am acting on what is the mere truth, and no injustice can arise to those who have dealt with the projectors, for against them, and all under whose authority they acted, there will be a clear right of action if the company does not fulfil the engagements which they have contracted that it shall perform, and that is surely all which those who have dealt with the projectors can claim as their right. For these reasons I am of opinion that there is no ground for holding that a company is bound by any engagement made by those who obtained its act of incorporation, unless those engagements are embodied in the terms of the act itself.

“It remains, however, to be considered how far this question, whatever may be my opinion of its merits, has been settled by authority. The three cases mainly relied on in support of the doctrine contended for by the respondents, who were pursuers below, namely, that a railway company, after it has obtained its act of incorporation, is bound by the contracts of those by whom the act was obtained, are those of Edwards v. Grand Junction R. Co., Stanley v. Chester and Birkenhead R. Co., and Lord Petre v. Eastern Counties R. Co.”

His lordship then stated the facts and part of Lord Cottenham's judgment (r) in the first of those cases, and proceeded:—

“In reasoning on this and other cases decided by Lord Cottenham, it has been contended that his judgments went no further than to decide that if the incorporated company took the benefit of the contracts entered into by third persons with the promoters, they, the company, must at the same time perform the obligations binding the promoters. I cannot reconcile such a supposition either with what fell from him in that case, or with the decision itself. The language which I have quoted seems to me to show clearly that he carried his views much further. He says expressly that the company are entitled to all the rights and subject to the liabilities of the projectors. He assumes that the company stand in place of the projectors, and treats the powers of the act as powers given by Parliament to the projectors, and the injunction restrains the company from exercising a power which they possessed independently of any contract with the road trustees, because such an exercise would be at variance with the contract between the trustees and the projectors. The judgment further proceeds upon the assumption that the forbearing to oppose the bill was a consideration moving from the trustees to the company, and not solely to the projectors. It is therefore plain that, according to Lord Cottenham's view of the law, the company, when incorporated, cannot exercise its powers in violation of contracts entered into by the projectors before the incorporation."

*Caledonian, &c.
R. Co. v. Magis-
burgh.*

His lordship then stated the cases of Stanley and Lord Petre, and added:—

"In this, as in the other cases, Lord Cottenham clearly considered that the company was bound by the contract of the promoters. Lord Petre's case is a very strong one, because the bill contained a statement that the payment of the £120,000 would so reduce the funds of the company as to make it impossible for them to complete their line, and yet Lord Cottenham considered that Lord Petre had a right as against the company to insist on the contract entered into by the six projectors, although the company refused to confirm it by deed under their seal.

"In one of these cases Lord Cottenham referred to Vauxhall Bridge Co. v. Lord Spencer (s), as in some degree sustaining his views of the law on this subject."

His lordship stated that case, and proceeded:—

"When that case is examined it is plain that it affords no countenance for the doctrine on which Lord Cottenham acted in the cases I have referred to. In the Vauxhall Bridge case there was no attempt to make any one liable on the bond except the obligors, and the only question was as to the validity of the engagement itself. It is true that the £5,000 was in fact advanced out of the funds of the company, but that arrangement did not form any part of the contract with the Battersea Bridge proprietors, who looked only to the persons with whom they contracted. The decision therefore may be disregarded as not bearing on the present question.

"The result is, that in the three cases to which I have referred, Lord Cottenham acted on the principle that a company incorporated by act of Parliament is, or may be, bound by the previous contracts of those by whom the act of incorporation has been obtained. I have stated my reason for thinking that such a doctrine rests on no sound principle, and may lead, as in Lord Petre's case I think it did lead, to great injustice. And if therefore the case now to be decided was in all respects similar to the three cases I have referred to, what I should have to decide would be, whether I should advise your lordships to adhere to the precedents established by

(s) 2 Madd. 356; Jac. 64.

*Caledonian, &c.
R. Co. v. Magis-
burgh.*

Lord Cottenham on the ground that it is unsafe to act against a series of decisions, even though they may appear not to rest on any solid foundation, or to depart from them and to adopt what I consider a just and more correct principle.

"I am, however, relieved from the necessity of coming to any positive decision on this point, because I think the present case is distinguishable from those decided by Lord Cottenham, and so that even if those authorities are to be held binding, still they do not govern the present case.

"In all the cases before Lord Cottenham, the contracts which he held to be binding on the company were contracts to do things warranted by the terms of the incorporation."

His lordship then proceeded to show that in the case before the House, what the projectors had contracted to do was to apply funds, raised under legislative authority for the purpose of the railway, to an object foreign from that of the railway, namely, the construction of a pier and harbour at Helensburgh, and said:—

"There are numerous authorities both in England and in Scotland to show that such a diversion of the funds from their statutable destination cannot be permitted."

Having then referred to one or two cases on this point, his lordship concluded:—

"I am therefore of opinion, that, even supposing the law to be (and in this respect the laws of England and Scotland are the same), that in respect of contracts entered into by the projectors of a company, that the company when formed shall do acts within the scope of their powers in a particular mode or on specified terms, the company is bound, still that doctrine does not apply here, where the act to be done was not an act for the effecting of which the company when established could lawfully devote its funds."

Construction and effect of contracts between pro-motors and landowners.

Let us now proceed to consider some of the cases which have arisen in the Courts, as to the construction of contracts entered into for the purchase of land before the special act is obtained, and as to the remedies available to the vendors of such land in cases where the contracts have not been carried into effect; first premising that contracts of this nature must of course, in general, be construed and governed by the same rules as other contracts of a similar kind; and that, in general, no proceedings, either at law or in equity, can be taken against the company when incorporated, upon an agreement entered into by the promoters, unless after incorporation the company have in some way ratified and adopted the agreement (t).

This latter difficulty was got over, in the cases of Webb and Lord James Stuart (u), by agreement. And in another case, where a landowner withdrew his opposition in Parliament to a railway bill,

(t) In Bedford and Cambridge R. Co. v. Stanley, 32 L. J. (Ch.) 60, Wood, V. C., held that the company, by giving notice to treat and taking possession under compulsory powers, had waived an agreement made by the promoters with the landowner, and therefore were not entitled to a decree for specific performance of it.

upon an agreement with the promoters that the company would take his land on certain terms, and after the passing of the act brought an action for breach of the agreement against the promoters, which action was stayed, on the company being made by arrangement defendants to a new action, and suffering judgment by default for the demand: it was held that the company thereby adopted the agreement, whether it would otherwise have been binding on them or not, and that it was not vitiated by one of its terms being that the company should pay the costs of the landowner's opposition to the bill (v).

Where the contract entered into by the promoters amounts to an absolute agreement on their part, that the company will take and pay for the land if the vendor supports the bill and it passes into a law; then upon the performance of those conditions, the vendor may maintain an action for damages against the promoters, if from any circumstance the company fail to carry out the agreement.

Construction of contracts between promoters and landowners.

Thus, in Bland v. Crowley (x), although the judges of the Exchequer differed in opinion as to the construction of a contract entered into by the provisional directors of a company, who promoted a railway bill in Parliament, a majority of this Court held the plaintiff entitled to recover in an action against the promoters. The declaration stated, that by agreement between the defendants and the plaintiff, the plaintiff covenanted that he would accede to the bill, and the defendants covenanted that, in the event of the bill passing into a law, the company would pay the plaintiff for so much of his land as should be intersected by the railway, at a certain rate per acre, and secondly, that they would pay him 3,000*l.* in full compensation for the general damage which the railway might do to the mansion and estate, including the crossing of the road near the park entrance, the lowering the road, the obstruction of views, disturbance of privacy of the park, and the expense of temporary residence during the progress of the works, the depreciation as a residence, the additional expense in the cultivation of farms by the alteration in the road, and all other damage to be done to the mansion and park. It was then alleged that the plaintiff assented to the bill, and that it passed into a law; that the company entered on the plaintiff's lands and cut down trees; and although seven acres were intersected and severed by the railway, and the park and mansion deteriorated, yet neither the company nor the defendants had paid the plaintiff the stipulated price per acre nor the 3,000*l.* The defendants pleaded, that the company did not enter on the plaintiff's land; and also, that the quantity of the plaintiff's land intersected by the railway was not required by the company for the purposes of the railway, nor was it severed from the remainder of the fields. The question raised by the pleadings on demurrer was, whether the payment of the 3,000*l.* depended upon the company's entering upon the plaintiff's land.

A majority of the Court (y) were of opinion that the defendants had bound themselves to pay the sum immediately after the passing of the act, although the railroad should not be constructed, or any damage done to the plaintiff. The defendants had covenanted in the event of the bill passing into a law, first, that the company should pay, at a certain rate per acre, for all land that might be required, and for damage by severance. If no land should be required, the stipulated price would not be payable; as none was required, the defendants could not be called upon to pay any part of the price. The second covenant was, that the company were to pay 3,000*l.* to the plaintiff in full compensation for the general damage which the line of railway should or might do to the mansion-house, including certain specified damage, and all other damage to the mansion-house and park. This latter covenant was a distinct and separate one, and not made contingent upon the company requiring the land. The reasonable construction of the covenant therefore was, that the 3,000*l.* was really the price of buying off the plaintiff's opposition, and the plaintiff having consented to the bill passing, he was entitled to recover it.

Pollock, C. B., on the other hand, was of opinion that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover in the action, and that the agreement had reference only to the question, which upon the passing of the act would arise between the plaintiff and the company, if the plaintiff's lands were taken, and that it meant to provide that instead of resorting to arbitrators or a jury, the claim should at once be considered to be settled by the agreement, the land at so much per acre, and the general damage at a gross sum, but that it was not intended to accelerate the payment of either sum, still less to make the latter payment of 3,000*l.* payable instant, wholly irrespective of whether any land should be taken or any damage done.

Shortly after this decision, Capper v. Earl of Lindsey (z), which was also an action in covenant against promoters, was brought to the House of Lords, on appeal from the Exchequer Chamber, and the judges were summoned, and delivered an unanimous opinion that the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

jected railway was to pass, became a party to a deed with the projectors of the railway, by which he covenanted to withdraw his opposition to their bill, and to oppose a rival bill, and they covenanted to pay him a certain sum of money, in case their bill should pass within six months from the date of the deed, or to pay him a different sum, if the rival bill should pass within eighteen months from the date of the deed. It was then provided, that, if the bill of these projectors should not be passed within six months from the date of the agreement, either party might put an end to the agreement by a notice. The deed then contained a covenant on the part of the projectors, by which they agreed, if the two companies should be amalgamated, to pay a certain sum, within three months after such amalgamation. The two companies were afterwards amalgamated, but no bill ever passed at the instance of these projectors alone, and they subsequently gave a notice to put an end to the agreement. The action was brought against the projectors on that clause of the deed by which the plaintiff was to receive a sum of money, within three months after the amalgamation of the companies; and the defendants pleaded that their bill had never passed into a law; that at the end of six months they had given notice to put an end to the agreement, at which time no part of the line of railway had been made on the estate of the plaintiff, nor had his lands been taken by the amalgamated company. The House of Lords decided, that the right to payment did not depend upon the fact of making a part of the railway of the amalgamated company on the plaintiff's estate, or taking or using or doing any injury to his land, but that the right to it depended simply on the effluxion of three months time after the passing of the Amalgamation Act, and the plea was consequently held bad; and the judgment of the Court below in favour of the plaintiff was affirmed.

But if it clearly appears from the contract, that the vendor is not to be paid the stipulated price, unless the company when incorporated require and actually take the land, then the contract is considered as conditional on the taking of the land; and if, in consequence of the abandonment of the railway from inability to raise the necessary funds or from any other cause, the company do not take the land, then neither they nor the promoters who signed the contract are bound to pay the stipulated price, no action is maintainable for it, or for damages for the nonpayment of it, nor will a Court of Equity decree specific performance.

This was decided in Gage v. Newmarket R. Co. (a). In that case a railway company, who were promoting in Parliament a bill for an extension of their line, which, if made, would pass through the lands of the plaintiff, covenanted, "that in the event of the proposed bill passing in the then session of Parliament, the company would, before they should enter upon any part of the plaintiff's lands, pay to him 4,900*l.* purchase-money for any portion, not exceeding forty-three acres, which the company might, under the powers of their act, require and take for the purposes of their undertaking; and that in addition to the purchase-money, the company should pay to the plaintiff, before they should enter upon any part of his land, 7,100*l.*, as landlord's compensation for the damage arising to his estate by the severance thereof, in respect of the lands, not exceeding forty-three acres, to be taken by them." The Court decided that the company were not liable to pay either of the above-mentioned sums unless they entered upon some part of the lands. Lord Campbell, C. J., delivered judgment as follows:—

"The question we have to determine is, whether, the company never having entered upon any part of the plaintiff's lands, he is now entitled to sue for these two sums, or either of them? The 4,900*l.* is declared to be the purchase-money for the land to be required and taken; and the only time of payment mentioned is before the company enter upon the land. Therefore, if no land is required or taken, and the company never enter on any part of the land, there seems great difficulty in saying that there has been a breach of covenant in not paying the money. So, the 7,100*l.* is declared to be a compensation for severance of the land taken from the rest of the plaintiff's land, and the same time of payment is defined. But there has been no severance to be compensated, and the time for payment has not arrived. The deed does not bargain for a sum of money to be paid absolutely by the company to the plaintiff, as a consideration for his withdrawing his opposition to the bill, but provides a peculiar mode of estimating the value of the land to be taken, and of the compensation to be made for severance-damage, instead of the modes pointed out by the general acts upon this subject. We, therefore, do not think that the company can be considered as having absolutely covenanted to pay 12,000*l.* to the plaintiff in a reasonable time after the passing of the act. If this deed could bear such a construction, we should have thought it so far ultra vires and void."

Preston v. Liverpool Junction R. Co.

The case of Preston v. Liverpool, Manchester, &c., R. Co. (b) was decided on similar grounds. The plaintiff had agreed with the projectors of the company that he would assent to a railway being made through his property, as laid down in the deposited plans of the company, upon condition that in case the company should in that or any subsequent session obtain an act of incorporation, the company should pay him 1,000*l.* for all lands required by the company for the due making of the railway, and the further sum of 4,000*l.* for residential injury to the estate; that a tunnel should be made in a particular part of the property, and a passenger station made at a spot indicated. The plaintiff thereupon withdrew his opposition to the bill, and the company obtained an act, and proceeded to survey the plaintiff's land, but subsequently the project of making the railway was abandoned. The plaintiff thereupon filed his bill for specific performance of the contract. The Master of the Rolls, however, dismissed it, and the plaintiff appealed to the House of Lords, when the decision of the Master of the Rolls was affirmed, on the ground that the contract was conditional on the railway being made, and as it was abandoned the plaintiff was not entitled to specific performance.

Specific performance refused.
Preston v. Liverpool Junction R. Co.

Upon similar principles in Webb v. Direct London and Portsmouth R. Co. (c), when the agreement was of a vague and contingent nature, specific performance was refused in equity. There an agreement made by the promoters, and, after the passing of their act, formally adopted by the company by deed under seal, stipulated that in consideration that an opposition to a bill in Parliament should be withdrawn, the company should pass over the plaintiff's land in a specified line, and construct certain accommodation works; and then, by the concluding clause, it was agreed—that the company should pay to the plaintiff 4,500*l.*, together with his costs incurred, before the company should enter on any of the lands of the plaintiff, for the purpose of making the railway, and that all timber and other trees on the lands to be taken by the company should be the property of the plaintiff. The 4,500*l.* was to be the purchase-money for the lands to be taken by the company for the formation of their railway, not exceeding eight acres, and for consequential damage. The company afterwards entered upon the plaintiff's land for the purpose only of surveying and taking levels, but ultimately abandoned the undertaking and refused to pay the 4,500*l.*, and Sir G. Turner, V. C., decreed a specific performance of the contract (d); but on appeal to the Lords Justices, that decision was reversed, but without prejudice to the right of the plaintiff to bring an action. The Court of Appeal seemed to doubt whether, under the circumstances, there was any contract at all, and whether the whole was not conditional on the existence and formation of the railway. But assuming that the instrument did amount to a contract, the Court held that it was not a case for specific performance. Lord Justice Cranworth said:—

Webb v. Direct London and Portsmouth R. Co.

“This is not only a case in which we ought not to interfere, but it is a case in which we should be exactly reversing the order of things, and making the machinery of this Court instrumental in doing injustice if we did interfere, because the only relief we could give would be to decree the payment of 4,500*l.* But here it is admitted, that what the contract amounts to is really this:—a contract to pay 4,500*l.*: to select eight acres of the plaintiff's land, and take it from him; and for such land and consequential damage to pay the 4,500*l.* Now, what the plaintiff would have to do at law, as I believe, would be to state in his declaration this contract, and to allege as a breach of it on the part of the defendants, that they had not taken the eight acres of land, nor paid the 4,500*l.* The amount of damage to be calculated would then, as I conceive, be a calculation made on the aggregate, what, taking all these circumstances into consideration, will do justice? Whereas the relief that would be afforded in this Court would be positive injustice. It would be giving 4,500*l.* as the purchase-money for that which they have not taken, and which, I believe (for there is reason to think that their parliamentary powers are gone), they never can now take. I do not, however, wish to commit myself on that subject. It may be that they could still take it and resell it. At all events, it is one of those cases in which, assuming the instrument to amount to what the plaintiff says it amounts to, a contract to pay 4,500*l.* by way of purchase-money, and compensation for damage to be done to other land, he has the ready means of obtaining complete redress at law, and we think to that redress he ought to be left."

*Lord James
 Stuart v. London and North-Western Railway Company.*

This case was followed by Lord James Stuart v. L. and N. W. R. Co. (e). In this case the following agreement was entered into in consideration of the withdrawal of an opposition to the company's bill by the Marquis of Bute:—"Watford and Dunstable Railway.—Heds of agreement for the purchase of the Marquis of Bute's land required by the above railway. As to A (f), the company were to give 400*l.* an acre for the land required for the railway, and an additional 100*l.* for making a particular road. As to B, which was land laid out for building purposes, and was called 'The Seven Acres,' the company were to give 1,250*l.* an acre, for seven acres. As to C, they were to give 400*l.* an acre, for what was required; and as to D, they were to give 250*l.* per acre; besides which, they were to pay 1,000*l.* for depreciation of homesteads, &c." The agreement then contained the following clause:—"The above prices refer to the quantities of land required for the railway, and to the contents of the roads and several portions which are respectively to be accurately measured." This agreement having been executed, the opposition to the bill was withdrawn, and the company obtained their act; but subsequently they abandoned the line of the railway over the lands in question, and the plaintiff thereupon, shortly before the compulsory powers of the company would expire, filed a bill for specific performance of the contract. Sir John Romilly, M. R., following the decision of Vice-Chancellor Turner in the last-mentioned case, decreed a specific performance (g), but on appeal this decree was

(f) The body of the agreement referred to a map at the end. There were four portions of land comprised in it, distinguished therein by the letters A, B, C and D, which respectively referred to the map. In this case the company were willing to admit an adoption by them of the agreement, which was in fact signed by their agents.

also reversed by the Lords Justices. Lord Justice Cranworth said:—

Specific performance refused.
Lord James Stuart v. London and North-Western R. Co.

"This case was decided by his Honor the Master of the Rolls, on the authority of Webb v. Direct London and Portsmouth R. Co. (h); not as that case now stands, it having been brought by appeal to this Court, but as it was after the decision of it by his Honor Vice-Chancellor Turner. As I understand from counsel, the Master of the Rolls seemed to intimate an opinion that but for that authority, probably, his decision might not have been such as, in fact, it was. If that be so, inasmuch as Webb v. Direct London and Portsmouth R. Co. has since been decided otherwise than it was decided by Vice-Chancellor Turner, we have not, in fact, the duty of substantially overruling anything that was meant to be decided by the Master of the Rolls, and we shall be acting in conformity with what would probably have been his opinion, but for a decision which he then thought binding upon him. I think this is a weaker case than Webb's case, so far as the plaintiffs are concerned. It is perhaps not necessary, and perhaps not proper, to give any opinion about the construction of the agreement, but it seems to me much more doubtful whether there was any binding contract at all. Upon that, however, I give no opinion. The ground on which we proceeded in Webb's case was this, that whether it was a contract or not, the circumstances of the case made it such that it was not fit for this court to interfere by way of specific performance, because these two circumstances conspired: first, that complete relief might be obtained at law, if the parties were entitled to any relief; and secondly, the principle of mutuality wholly failed, for it was impossible for the company to hold the land for their benefit in consideration of the money which they were to pay. Now, it appears to me that that principle applies precisely in the same way in this case as it did in that."

Lord Justice K. Bruce was also unable to view the case as one for specific performance. His Lordship said:—

"I am of opinion that the language of the document in parts of it necessary to be construed and acted upon, if there is to be a decree of any kind for specific performance against the defendants, is too vague, too uncertain, too obscure, to enable this Court to act with safety or propriety for any such purpose. The plaintiffs must, I conceive, be left to proceed at law as they may be advised."

The general grounds upon which Courts of Equity will decree specific performance in these cases is thus stated by Lord St. Leonards in Eastern Counties R. Co. v. Hawkes (i):—

Eastern Counties R. Co. v. Hawkes.

"In cases of contracts binding on railway companies, in the view of equity, the Court goes beyond the law. Now specific performance is the right of every seller as well as of every purchaser, unless it can be displaced. It has been said, but has long since been overruled, that a seller may go to law as he only wants the money, whereas the purchaser wants the estate, but a seller wants the exact sum agreed to be paid to him, and he wants to divest himself legally of the estate, which, after the contract, was no longer vested in him beneficially. This is accomplished by specific performance, whereas at law he would be left with the estate on his hands, and would recover damages only according to the views of a jury. He is entitled to a complete remedy, and if you refuse him a specific performance, you deprive him of that which you accord to the purchaser. Look at the consequence. Equity, immediately after the contract, considers the purchaser as owner of the estate; he may sell or devise it; it would descend to his heir; it is no longer the property of the seller; on the other hand, the money, the price, belongs to the seller; he may dispose of it as part of his personal estate, and it would go to his personal representatives as such. Now, if you capriciously withhold specific relief, a seller can never be sure what is the nature of his interest; as, for example, whether the estate will go to his heir, or the price to his next of kin. This rule applies as forcibly to a railway company as to an individual. In my opinion it applies with even more force in a case like this. For when a railway company purchases property, nothing but a specific performance would answer the object of the company, and the legislature has taken care to ensure that object; whereas in many purchases it is indifferent to a purchaser whether he obtains the estate or damages. The remedy of a seller in a contract for a sale to a railway company ought to be co-extensive with the remedy of the company."

This case of Eastern Counties R. Co. v. Hawkes (k) is the only case in which specific performance of a contract, made by the projectors of a railway company for the purchase of lands, has been decreed against the company after the passing of the act. In that case it was granted, although the company declined to enter upon the lands, and in fact abandoned their undertaking altogether. The decision is therefore of great practical importance. This case was argued five times. Twice before Sir K. Bruce, V. C., who decreed specific performance of the contract, and overruled exceptions which had been taken to the Master's report on the title; thirdly, upon appeal against that decree, before Lord Truro, C., who resigned the seals before he delivered his judgment (l); fourthly, before Lord St. Leonards, C.; and lastly, before the House of Lords (m), when the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor was affirmed.

The agreement in question was under the corporate seal of a railway company, who were the promoters of a bill in Parliament, for a branch line from their railway to Spalding, with an extension to form a junction with the Ambergate Railway, and the company thereby agreed, conditionally on the bill passing, to purchase the whole of the plaintiff's lands, of part of which he was owner in fee-simple, and of the other part only tenant for life, and to obtain all necessary powers for enabling him to complete the purchase. One-third only of the plaintiff's land was within the limits of deviation, and directly affected by the bill in Parliament. The objects of the agreement were to induce the plaintiff to withdraw his opposition to the bill, and also to enable the company to form, independently of Parliament, by means of a diverging line passing through a part of his lands, not included in the deposited plans, a junction with the Ambergate Railway, in the event of the extension proposed by the company's bill being rejected by Parliament. There was nothing in the agreement or evidence to show that the plaintiff knew of the latter object of the company. The bill passed into an act, with a clause prohibiting the formation of the extension line, but giving the company power to purchase land, not exceeding thirty acres, for extraordinary purposes. The company afterwards abandoned the whole of the proposed undertaking, and declined to perform the contract, whereupon the plaintiff filed his bill, and was held entitled to specific performance, which could not be refused simply on the ground that an action might be maintained upon the contract.

In connection with the subject before us, we may remark, that if an agreement be made to withdraw opposition to a bill, in consideration that the company promoting it should make a branch line for the convenience of the petitioner against the bill, it seems that the company may afterwards apply to Parliament, for a bill authorizing the abandonment of the branch line. Lord Cottenham, C., refused to grant an injunction to restrain the application for such a bill, but evidently upon the ground that Parliament has the power of destroying, altering or affecting existing rights, but, nevertheless, always providing compensation to the party whose rights are sought to be affected (o). And the Court of Chancery will allow a guardian or other trustee to take steps for opposing the progress of a bill in Parliament, or to enter into negotiations with the promoters, if it is shown that the company propose to take lands in a manner which may be prejudicial to the owner, whose estates are under the care of the Court (p).

Parliament may release contracts.

Equity will authorize trustees to appear in Parliament.

If a contract contains any stipulation which is a condition precedent to the payment of the money by the company, it must be duly performed. Thus, where trustees of lands which were required by the managing committee of a projected railway company, for which a bill was pending in Parliament, agreed that in consideration of 11,700*l.* to be paid to the plaintiffs by the railway company, the railway should pass through the lands, and if the bill should pass in Parliament, the company should, within six months after the passing of the bill, pay to the plaintiffs the said purchase-money, and in consideration thereof should have conveyed to them nineteen acres of the land, the whole of the agreement to be null and void unless sanctioned by the Court of Chancery in a cause of Laurence v. Porcher, and so much of the agreement as the Court required should be inserted in the act, and the plaintiffs neglected to obtain the sanction of the Court of Chancery within the six months: it was held that they could not recover on the contract, because the obtaining the sanction of the Court of Chancery to the agreement within six months of the passing of the bill was a condition precedent to the payment of the money by the defendants (q).

2. Powers to take and purchase Lands, by Agreements made after the Special Act is obtained.

We are now arrived at the second branch of our inquiry, which relates to the purchase of lands by agreements entered into, after the special act has been obtained. In these cases it is not of course necessary to resort to the compulsory powers which the company may enforce. The authority of the company as to the taking of lands for the purposes of the railway is necessarily of a very extensive character. Large powers are contained in a single clause in the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act (r), which enacts that, subject to the provisions and restrictions in the acts (s), "it shall be lawful for the company, for the purpose of constructing the railway or the accommodation works connected therewith, to execute any of the following works; (that is to say),

"They may make or construct in, upon, across, under or over any lands, or any streets, hills, valleys, roads, railroads or tramroads, rivers, canals, brooks, streams, or other waters, within the lands described in the said plans, or mentioned in the said books of reference, or any correction thereof, such temporary or permanent inclined planes, tunnels, embankments, aqueducts, bridges, roads, ways, passages, conduits, drains, piers, arches, cuttings, and fences, as they think proper:

Lands may also be purchased for extraordinary purposes.

"For the purpose of making and providing additional stations, yards, wharfs, and places for the accommodation of passengers, and for receiving, depositing, and loading or unloading goods or cattle to be conveyed upon the railway, and for the erection of weighing machines, tollhouses, offices, warehouses and other buildings and conveniences:

(t) When the legislature authorize a company to take lands specially described in their acts, it constitutes them judges whether they will or will not take those lands, provided they act with the bonâ fide object of using the lands for purposes authorized, and not for collateral purposes. *Stockton and Darlington R. If then the company can, without resorting to the compulsory powers, enter into voluntary agreements with the owners of any lands, messuages, tenements or hereditaments, which are required to be taken or used for the purposes of the railway, they are authorized to do so by the following provisions in the statutes.

Lands taken by agreement.

By 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, s. 6 (App. 47), it is enacted that, subject to the provisions of that and the special act, it shall be lawful for the company to agree with the owners of any lands (x), by the special act authorized to be taken, and which shall be required for the purposes of such act, and with all parties having any estate or interests in such lands, or by that or the special act enabled to sell and convey the same, for the absolute purchase, for a consideration in money, of any such lands, or such parts thereof as they shall think proper, and of all estates and interests in such lands, of what kind soever (y).

Tenants in tail and other parties under disabilities may sell and convey lands.

And, as many persons are incapacitated from selling their lands, by reason of disabilities of various kinds, the statute proceeds to declare it to be lawful (z) for all parties being seised, possessed of, or entitled to any such lands, or any estate or interest therein, to sell and convey or release the same to the company, and to enter into all necessary agreements for that purpose, and particularly for all or any of the following parties, &c. (that is to say,) all corporations, tenants in tail or for life (a), married women seised in their own right or entitled to dower, guardians, committees of lunatics and idiots, trustees or feoffees in trust for charitable or other purposes, executors and administrators, and all parties for the time being entitled to the receipt of the rents and profits of any such lands in possession, or subject to any estate in dower, or to any lease for life, or for lives and years, or for years, or any less interest.

And this power so to sell, &c., may be exercised by all the before-mentioned parties, (other than married women entitled to dower, or lessees for life, or for lives and years, or for years, or for any less interest,) not only on behalf of themselves and their respective heirs, executors, administrators, and successors, but also for and on behalf of every person entitled in reversion, remainder or expectancy after them, or in defeasance of the estates of such parties, and as to such married women, whether they be of full age or not, as if they were sole and of full age, and as to such guardians, on behalf of their wards, and as to such committees, on behalf of the lunatics and idiots of whom they are the committees respectively, and that to the same extent as such wives, wards, lunatics, and idiots respectively could have exercised the same power, under the authority of that or the special act, if they had respectively been under no disability, and as to such trustees, executors, and administrators, on behalf of their cestui que trusts, whether infants, issue unborn, lunatics, femmes covert, or other persons, and that to the same extent as such cestui que trusts respectively could have exercised the same powers, under the authority of that and the special act, if they had respectively been under no disability: (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, s. 7, post, App. 47.)

Tenants in tail and other parties under disability may sell lands.

And persons entitled to lands absolutely may convey them in consideration of an annual rent-charge (b), (Sect. 10,) secured on the tolls or rates payable to the company, and recoverable, when in arrear, by action or distress: (Sect. 11.) The before-mentioned powers to sell and convey lands, given by sect. 7, extend to lands which the company may be authorized to take for extraordinary purposes (c): (Sect. 12.) And such lands may be sold by the company, and other lands in lieu thereof be purchased by them: (Sect. 13.) But such subsequent purchases cannot be made from persons under a legal disability to sell and convey the same: (Sect. 14.)

Powers extend to lands taken for extraordinary purposes.

Municipal corporations may not, except in certain cases, sell lands, unless with the consent of the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury: (Sect. 15.) Nor may the company construct any work on the sea-shore below high-water mark, or on any navigable river, without the consent of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, and the Lord High Admiral. If such works are constructed, contrary to the provisions of the act, they may be abated at the cost of the company: (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 17, post, App.) The Railways Clauses Act, 1863 (d), also contains some further provisions for the protection of navigation.

Lands on the sea-shore, navigable rivers, &c.

With respect to mines lying under the railway, it is provided, that the company shall not be entitled to any mines of coal, ironstone, slate or other minerals (e), under any land purchased by them, (except only such part thereof as shall be necessary to be dug or carried away or used in the construction of the works,) unless the same shall have been expressly purchased, and such mines shall be deemed to be Provisions for removal of incumbrances affecting the title of lands, and for protecting reversioners, &c.

It is also enacted that the power given by the acts (g) to enfranchise copyhold lands, &c., and to release lands from any rent, charge, or incumbrance, and to agree for the apportionment of any rent, charge, or incumbrance, shall extend to every party thereinbefore enabled to sell and convey, or release lands to the company (h).

Protection for reversioners, &c.

For the purpose however of preventing any loss to parties entitled in reversion or remainder, it is provided that the purchase-money or compensation to be paid for any lands to be purchased or taken from any party under any disability or incapacity, and not having power to sell or convey such lands, except under the provisions of the acts, and the compensation to be paid for any permanent damage or injury to any such lands, shall not, except where the same shall have been determined by the verdict of a jury, or by arbitration, or by the valuation of a surveyor appointed by two justices under the provision contained in the act, be less than shall be determined by the valuation of two able practical surveyors, one nominated by the company, and the other by the other party (i); and if these surveyors cannot agree, then by a third surveyor, to be appointed by two justices, and the surveyors must annex to the valuation a declaration in writing of the correctness thereof; and all such purchase-money or compensation is to be deposited in the Bank of England, for the benefit of the parties interested, in manner thereafter mentioned (k).

Specific performance of contracts.

Contracts made under the foregoing powers should be under the seal of the company, and it is clear that they may then be enforced in equity, by a decree for specific performance, subject of course to the same rules, as we have already seen discussed, with reference to contracts made before the Special Act is obtained (l). If the agreement contains a stipulation that convenient communications shall be made with adjoining lands, or other similar provisions, the Master will be directed to institute an inquiry on these points (m). But if the agreement provides that the price or compensation shall be settled by an arbitrator or otherwise, then it seems that a suit for specific performance cannot be maintained until the amount is settled and ascertained (n). Thus, where the first and second tenants for life of lands entered into a contract with a railway company to sell them lands at a price to be fixed by arbitration or a jury, and the company entered into possession, and paid a sum of money into the Bank, and the first tenant for life died, before the amount of the purchase-money was ascertained, or the means of ascertaining it appointed, it was decided that no decree for specific performance of the contract would lie against the company (o). But where notice to take land is followed by an award of purchase and compensation money, Courts of Equity have jurisdiction upon bill filed by the landowner to compel the company to complete the purchase (p).

And where the lessees of premises, occupied by them as a ropery, agreed to withdraw their opposition to a bill in Parliament for a railway, which would intersect their premises, and the agreement, among other stipulations, provided that the railway should be so constructed as that, when finished, the level of the ropery should not be altered, nor the surface of the ropery be in the least respect diminished, and the parties afterwards disagreed as to the meaning of the agreement, Lord Truro, C., decided that the company were bound to restore the surface, so as to make it available for all practical purposes, and not as a ropery only. There was nothing to show that the future application of the land was to be confined to that of a ropery; and there was nothing in the agreement to qualify its plain meaning, or to restrain its operation to the plaintiff's tenancy (q).

their compulsory powers, except that lands taken for extraordinary purposes under sect. 45 (ante, 169), if they happen to be beyond the limits of deviation, can only be taken by agreement.

We shall hereafter consider in detail what lands may be taken for the purposes of the railway and works, and especially with regard to the power of the company to make deviations from the line laid down on the parliamentary plans, but it may be convenient to refer, in this place, to some clauses in the acts, which are of importance.

Part only of a house or manufactory cannot be taken.

8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, s. 92.

And first, it is enacted by sect. 92, "that no party shall at any time be required to sell or convey to the company, a part only of any house or other building or manufactory (r), if such party be willing and able to sell and convey the whole thereof" (s).

This section applies, although the landowner may have only a leasehold interest (t).

Dakin v. L. & N. W. R. Co.

Questions have however arisen as to what description of premises fall within the above definition of "a part only of any house or other building or manufactory." In Dakin v. L. and N. W. R. Co. (u), Wigram, V. C., required a company to take a dwelling-house and the entire premises, where they proposed to take only a privy situate at the end of a garden used with the dwelling-house. In another case (x), where the land proposed to be taken by a company was a (r) In Gibson v. Hammersmith R. Co., 32 L. J. (Ch.) 337, Kindersley, V. C., held that "manufactory" meant a building as it stood, with engines, &c., fixed to it, and not merely bricks and mortar; and see ibid. as to fixtures generally. Whatever the company are bound to take under sect. 92, must be taken into account and valued if they proceed under sect. 85.—Ibid. See also Pulling v. London, Chatham and Dover R. Co., post, p. 176.

C. 411, and those of Lord Cottenham, C., 5 Railw. C. 419. Whether a company passing under a house or manufactory, by means of a tunnel, may be compelled to take the whole of the premises, was the subject of discussion in a case where Lord Cranworth, L. J., said on this subject, "The only remaining point is, that although the company have given a notice, in the ordinary way, that they mean to take the land, they are now entitled, if they cannot take the land, to burrow under it, by making a tunnel, which they say they are able and willing to do, without taking or touching any part of the surface. A great number of arguments in support of this view were urged upon us. It was said, Suppose the manufactory was at the top of a hill, and you were burrowing under it at the distance of 1000 feet, are you then taking part of the manufactory? I do not feel myself called upon to answer that question: but if I were, I should incline to the opinion that you are, on the principle of the maxim, 'Cujus est solum ejus est usque ad inferos.' Can it be said, that if you were an inch below the surface, you would not take a part of the manufactory? I am inclined to think that, however deep the tunnel was made, it would be within the enactment.

"I do not, however, think that question arises, because here is a notice to take the land, and upon that notice the company were proceeding to take it in the ordinary way. That is virtually what was contemplated when the notice was given." Sparrow v. Oxford and Wolverhampton R. Co., ubi supra. See also as to tunnels, Ramsden v. Manchester R. Co., 1 Exch. 723;

strip of land, within the walls of premises which were used as an iron and tin plate manufactory, and over which strip a person had a right of way, but it had been the practice to use the strip as a place of deposit for rubbish and the scoria which came from the furnaces, it was ruled by Lord Cranworth and Sir K. Bruce, L. Js., that the strip proposed to be taken constituted a part of the manufactory, and that the company must therefore take the whole of the premises.

Part only of a house, &c. cannot be taken.

In another case (y), the trustees of some intended almshouses contracted to buy an acre of land, and to build almshouses on a particular plan, and add wings when they had funds. Before they built any part, a railway company gave them notice of their intention to apply to Parliament for an act. The centre was built, and then the company gave notice of their intention to take part of the land on which one of the wings would be built according to the plan. The trustees had no funds to build wings; but filed a bill against the company for an injunction to restrain them from taking the land unless they took the whole. The line of railway would not come within some few inches of the building already erected. It was held by the Lords Justices, reversing a decision of Wood, V. C., that although the company did not propose to touch the actual building, they would be taking part of a house, and must be restrained. And Knight Bruce, L. J., said—

Grosvenor v. Hampstead Junction R. Co.

“The singular manner in which the 92nd section is worded has certainly given rise to various questions as to the true meaning of the word ‘house’ contained in that section: whether it is or is not to be considered as used in a more limited sense than that in which the law generally, if not universally, understands it. But I thought that all such questions had been long set at rest, and that for the sake of general convenience, and for the sake of ordinary justice to private proprietors, the word ‘house’ in that section was to be read in its ordinary and legal sense.”

In another case (z), three houses were built upon a plot of land, a portion of which was laid out in gardens for each house: a summer-house and other detached outhouses were also built. The company required a portion for the purpose of their undertaking, but refused to purchase the whole. It was held, however, by the M. R., upon a bill by the freeholder, that the gardens were part of the houses to which they were attached, and that the company was bound to purchase the two houses and premises from which parts of the gardens were taken, and to make compensation for any injury sustained in respect of the third house. Upon similar principles it was held (a), that where the governors of an ancient hospital had purchased additional land, on part of which a new wing had been built, and the rest was laid out as a garden for the use of the entire hospital, a railway company was not entitled to take any part of the newly acquired premises without purchasing the whole hospital.

What is not "part of a house."

But in the following case it was held that a strip of land held for pleasure only, and on the other side of a road, was not "part of a house" within the meaning of sect. 92 (b).

*Fergusson v.
London, Brighton,

F. was lessee of a house and garden, and of a strip of meadow land separated therefrom by a road originally made for the convenience of himself and the lessees of the adjoining houses, but which road was afterwards thrown open to the public. Each of the other lessees had also a strip of land on the other side of the road. The leases contained covenants restraining the lessees from building on the strips, and the strips were by arrangement all thrown into one piece, and were used by F. and the other lessees in common as cricket and pleasure ground, the whole being also let to a butcher for grazing purposes. A railway company required this piece of land for the construction of their line. F. insisted that the company, if they took the land, must also take his house and garden, and on their proceeding to obtain possession under the Lands Clauses Act, filed his bill for an injunction. But the Master of the Rolls refused it, considering it doubtful whether the strip of meadow land was "part of a house." On appeal the decree was affirmed by Lord Justice Turner, although Lord Justice Knight Bruce dissented.

*Pulling v. London, Chatham and

And a field separated from the garden of a house by a ha-ha, traversed by a gravel walk leading to a coachman's house at the further end thereof, and used occasionally for purposes of pleasure (archery and dancing), though chiefly as pasture for cows, was held by Turner, L. J., (dubitante K. Bruce, L. J.,) not to be part of the house within sect. 92 (c).

And it is to be observed that a landowner, part of whose house (within sect. 92) is taken, cannot under that section compel the company to take any portion beyond what it requires, less than the whole (c).

(a) St. Thomas's Hospital v. Charing Cross R. Co., 1 Jo. & H. 400; S. C., 30 L. J. (Ch.) 395. See also Giles v. London, Chatham and Dover R. Co., ibid. 603; 1 Dr. & Sm. 406; where a company, having given notice that they should require part of a workshop, were compelled to take the whole premises, and could not take possession of part on paying into Court the value of part under sect. 85. In Alexander v. West End of London and Crystal Palace R. Co., 31 L. J.

(Ch.) 500, it was held that the company could not take part of intended gardens of unfinished houses, without taking the whole land intended for gardens and the houses. See also Reddin v. Metropolitan Board of Works, 31 L. J. (Ch.) 660.

(b) Fergusson v. London, Brighton and South Coast R. Co., 33 L. J. (Ch.) 29; 8 L. T. (N. S.) 718; 9 L. T. (N. S.) 134.

(c) Pulling v. London, Chatham and Dover R. Co., 33 L. J. (Ch.) 505.

Where a railway company gives notice to treat for part of any premises, a landowner does not, by negotiating for sale of part, preclude himself from afterwards insisting on his right to compel the company to take the whole under sect. 92; and when once he has given his notice in reasonable time, the company cannot take possession (e).

If the company proceed to treat for a part only of a house, building or manufactory, in contravention of sect. 92, the owner or party interested should give the company notice that he requires them to take the whole, but he may not apply for a mandamus to compel them to do so, because in that case the company may abandon their intention, and refuse to take any part of the premises. Thus, where the owner of a manufactory, who had received a notice from the company of their intention to take a part of his premises, obtained a writ of mandamus to compel them to take the whole, the Court of Queen's Bench, on demurrer, decided that, although the 92nd section protected the owner from being obliged to sell part, it does not contain any words making it obligatory on the company, who only want a part, to take the whole; and, therefore, that the writ, which was founded entirely on such a supposed obligation on the part of the company, could not be sustained. In the same case, it was contended for the applicant, that the mandamus might go, as to that part only of the land in respect of which the notice had been given by the company; but the court refused to assent to this argument, and quashed the writ generally (f).

A mandamus does not lie to compel the company to take the whole.

R. v. London and South-Western R. Co.

It may be convenient in this place to mention that, in a case (g) in which a railway act (before the Lands Clauses Act) contained a clause, that if the owner of any house, manufactory, ground or building which should be situate within fifty feet of the railway should give notice to the company to purchase his interest in such house, &c., the company should treat for the purchase of his interest in the house, &c., mentioned in such notice: it was held, that the owner of a principal dwelling-house and garden within fifty feet of the railway, who was also the owner of a vinegar manufactory, brewery and five smaller dwelling-houses immediately adjoining the same, but more than fifty feet from the railway, could not require the company to purchase any other portion of the premises beyond the principal dwelling-house and garden. But in another case (h), in which a railway act (also before the Lands Clauses Act) required the company

The Lands Clauses Act also contains the following provisions with respect to small portions of intersected land (j).

Owners may require a company to purchase small portions of intersected land.

8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, s. 93.

By sect. 93, if any lands, not situate in a town (i), or built upon, shall be so cut through and divided by the works as to leave, either on both sides, or on one side thereof, a less quantity of land than half a statute acre, and if the owner of such small parcel of land require the promoters of the undertaking to purchase the same, along with the other land required for the purposes of the special act, the promoters of the undertaking shall purchase the same accordingly, unless the owner thereof have other land adjoining to that so left, into which the same can be thrown, so as to be conveniently occupied therewith; and if such owner have any other land so adjoining, the promoters of the undertaking shall, if so required by the owner, at their own expense, throw the piece of land so left into such adjoining land, by removing the fences and levelling the sites, and by soiling the same in a sufficient and workmanlike manner.

By sect. 94, if any such (k) land shall be so cut through and divided as to leave on either side of the works a piece of land of less extent than half a statute acre, or of less value than the expense of making a bridge, culvert, or such other communication between the land so divided, as the promoters of the undertaking are, under the provisions of this or the special act, or any act incorporated therewith, compellable to make, and if the owner of such lands have not other lands adjoining such piece of land, and require the promoters of the undertaking to make such communication, then the promoters

(i) Where the trustees of a turnpike road were by an act restricted from placing a turnpike gate across the roads in the town of T., it was held that the judge properly defined to the jury the meaning of the word "town" in the act, by directing them to consider whether the turnpike gate was within the town; that is to say, "whether the place on which it stood was so surrounded by houses, that the inhabitants on either side might be fairly said, in a popular sense, to dwell together, and with the inhabitants of T." R. v. Cottle, 15 Jur. 721 (Q. B.); 20 L. J. (M. C.) 162; 16 Q. B. 412. On the trial of an issue whether a railway was passing through a "town" within the meaning of the Railways Clauses Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 11), the judge at Nisi Prius merely told the jury that the word "town" was to be understood in its ordinary and popular sense; but this was held to be a misdirection, inasmuch as such a definition of the meaning of the word "town" should have been given as would have enabled the jury to decide the issue. The Court of Exchequer suggested that the word "town" in that act means a collection of inhabited houses so near to each other, that they may reasonably be said to be continuous, and the term would include a space of open ground surrounded by continuous houses, and also open spaces occupied as mere accessories to such houses, although not so surrounded. *Elliott v. of the undertaking may require such owner to sell to them such piece of land, and any dispute as to the value of such piece of land, or as to what would be the expense of making such communication, shall be ascertained as herein provided for cases of disputed compensation; and on the occasion of ascertaining the value of the land required to be taken for the purposes of the works, the jury or the arbitrators, as the case may be, shall, if required by either party (l), ascertain by their verdict or award, the value of any such severed piece of land, and also what would be the expense of making such communication.

When compulsory powers commence and expire.—We may now proceed to state that the compulsory powers contained in the acts cannot be put in force, unless the whole of the estimated capital of the company has been subscribed by them under a contract (m), and a certificate from two justices, that the whole of the capital has been so subscribed, is sufficient evidence thereof (n); and, further, the powers for the compulsory purchase or taking of lands for the purposes of the special act may not be exercised after the prescribed period (o); and if no period be prescribed, not after the expiration of three years from the passing of the special act (p). The compulsory powers must, of course, be exercised for the sole purpose of constructing the railway (q).

Capital must be subscribed.

Compulsory powers cannot be exercised after a period prescribed.

An important point has been raised, as to the effect of this section, in cases where the company have given a notice that lands are required, and the owner, before the expiration of the prescribed period, duly intimated his desire that a jury should be summoned, but the company having taken no further steps, the question was, whether a writ of mandamus would lie, after the prescribed period had elapsed,

On the certificate of the Board of Trade that the public safety require additional land for the above purposes, the compulsory powers of purchasing and taking the lands mentioned in the certificate are revived for such further period as shall be therein mentioned. to compel the company to proceed to summon a jury. This question was decided in the affirmative in R. v. Birmingham and Oxford Junction R. Co. (r), where it is said that the limitation does not apply against a landholder in such a case, because a notice to treat is an inchoate purchase, and after that has been given in due time, it is competent for the landowner to compel the completion of the purchase. So where a company had taken possession of lands, under the 85th section of the Lands Clauses Act, before the expiration of the prescribed period, having complied with all the requisites, by paying the proper sum of money into the Bank of England, and giving a bond, but the company took no further steps to ascertain the amount to be paid by them as compensation, or to clothe themselves with the legal title, and all parties remained inactive until the time limited for exercising the compulsory powers had expired,—it was held that, the company having rightfully entered upon the lands before the expiration of the prescribed period, an ejectment could not be maintained against them after that period (s). And it has also been decided, that if the company give a notice that the lands are required, and afterwards, even a day before the compulsory powers expire, give a bond and deposit money in pursuance of the 85th section, neither their powers to purchase, nor their powers to enter upon the lands, are gone by the effluxion of the prescribed period (t). These cases appear to have been decided upon the principle that as soon as the company have given a notice to take land, they have exercised their powers of compulsory purchase, and that all the subsequent steps are not an exercise of the powers of compulsory purchase, but of powers which are intended to carry that purchase into effect (u).

The company are to give notice that they are willing to treat for the purchase of lands, and as to compensation. Sect. 18.

The Notice to Treat.—Having thus shown what lands may be taken, and when the compulsory powers may be exercised, we arrive at sect. 18, which enacts, “that when the company shall require to purchase or take any of the lands which by the acts they are authorized to purchase or take, they shall give notice (x) thereof to all the died before the purchase-money was assessed, it was held that there was no conversion of the land into money (g). But where the purchase and compensation money are fixed, Courts of Equity will treat the conversion of the land into money as complete (h), and a suit for specific performance may be maintained (i). Where, however, there is great delay in proceeding on such notices they will be considered as abandoned (k); as, whatever may have been the case formerly, the modern rule of equity requires parties to be prompt in seeking the assistance of the Court on bills for specific performance (l). Where a notice was given which stated that the company would require twenty perches of land, and before anything further was done on either side, they gave notice of withdrawal of that notice, and that only one perch of land was required, it was ruled that the last notice was a nullity (m). And it is no answer to say that they have no funds (n). There is, however, an exception to this rule, in the case of notices given by commissioners for public works. Where the defendants, who were authorized to purchase lands for forming a royal park, gave notice under the provisions of the act that certain lands would be required, it was held to be a good return to a mandamus requiring the commissioners to summon a jury to assess the value of the lands, to show that the undertaking had been abandoned for want of funds. This decision is valuable, as showing the stringency of the rule laid down in the text, in cases where private companies have given such notices. Patteson, J., says,—

“If this were the case of a railway or other private company, no doubt the return would be insufficient, because notice having been given that the lands were required, and a claim sent in accordingly, a contract is entered into, and the parties stand in the relation of vendor and purchaser. If the company had not the means of paying for the lands, they should have abstained from giving notice to the owner. But a private company, to whom an act is granted for their profit, differs materially from commissioners appointed under a public act, to do on behalf of the executive government certain things for the benefit of the public; and the principle that imposes liabilities upon a private company, as arising in consideration of the statute granted to them, has no application in the case of such public commissioners. may be reason for holding a notice to treat for a purchase, when given by a private company, which has the option of taking land, to be a declaration of their option to take, and a contract of purchase, of which this Court will compel specific performance, making the obligation on such a company reciprocal with the obligation on the landowner. But in the case of commissioners for the public, having a limited power of taking land, provided that the required quantity can be obtained for a given sum, a notice to treat for the purchase should be construed to be that which it is; the commissioners cannot ascertain whether the land can be obtained for a price, unless they treat for a purchase. There is a duty under the statute to open the treaty; but it would defeat the intention of the legislature, if the opening of a treaty was held to be the completion of the contract (o).

The notice to treat.

But it is now well settled that the powers of the company are not exhausted when they have given one notice; but they may issue a second, and require additional lands. In an early case (p) Lord Cottenham, C., said,—

Further notices may be given that additional lands are required.

“That the statute had not expressly laid down any rule on this point, but simply that the company were to give notice of what land they required; in other words, that they cannot take any land without notice. Here, however, it is contended that the company are bound to determine, once for all, what quantity of land they will require, and that where they have taken a certain quantity under one notice, they cannot afterwards, if they find it insufficient, come for more. I am of opinion that nothing could be more inconvenient than to lay down such a rule. The company are naturally desirous of taking as little land as is necessary for their undertaking. But a thousand unforeseen circumstances may occur in the progress of their works, which may make it necessary for them to have more land than they originally calculated on. And, until the works are complete, they cannot be certain whether they may or may not require more land than they at first gave notice for. Of this the case now under consideration is one instance, that of Webb v. Manchester and Leeds R. Co. (q) is another; and it is plain that the effect of laying down such a rule would be either to compel these companies in all cases to take more land than they will probably want, or, if they happen to give notice originally for less than they eventually require, to put them at the mercy of the landholder; while, on the other hand, the inconvenience to the landowner from the contrary rule is comparatively trifling. This construction of the act is more consistent than the other with what may be presumed to have been the intention of the legislature; for it is that which the interest of these companies requires, and which does not expose landowners to anything like the inconvenience to which the contrary construction would subject the companies. I think the act is not only capable of such a construction, but that it is the right and proper one” (r).

Stamps v. Birmingham and Stour Valley R. Co.

So where a company having opened the main line of the railway for traffic, but not having completed the stations and works, took compulsory proceedings, within the prescribed period, to obtain certain lands near the station, within the limits of deviation, for the purpose of laying down a branch railway to communicate with a river, it was ruled that the defendants were authorized, under the 16th section, to take these lands, inasmuch as they had not exhausted all the powers given them by the act, and had not finished all their works (s).

When lands are in the possession of a receiver or committee of lunatics.

If the lands required by the company are in the possession of a receiver, or of the committee of a lunatic appointed by the Court of Chancery, the company should make a special application to the Court, for if they proceed, without the sanction of the Court, to enforce the statutory compulsory powers, an injunction may be obtained to restrain their proceedings (t).

Waiver of notice to treat by conduct of party interested.

The issuing of the notice to treat is the foundation of the right of the company to proceed to assess the compensation (u); but if a party interested in lands enter into negotiations with the company, and agree to waive the necessary notice to treat, he is afterwards estopped from taking the objection that he never received a notice (x); and, on the same principle, it was decided that the company, after appearing before a jury, cannot object to an inquisition, on the ground that it did not disclose that a notice to treat had been duly served (y).

The Notice of Claim.—When the party claiming any estate or interest in the lands proposed to be taken has received notice from the company requiring him to treat, he must, without loss of time, determine on the course which he will pursue. should state claimant's interest accurately.

This claim should state correctly the nature of the claimant's interest in the land, and if he be owner, any existing tenancies should be specified. An error in this respect may be fatal to all the subsequent proceedings, as will appear by the following cases.

In one case (a) it appeared that the claimants, in answer to a

J., said it was the barest notice that would pass muster. See also Healey v. Thames Valley R. Co., Q. B. (M. T.) 1864, where a notice that the lands "are held by me on notice given by the company, stated that, as trustees under a will, they claimed an estate and interest in copyhold lands and hereditaments, and they claimed a certain sum as compensation for the said lands and hereditaments, and appointed an arbitrator. The company, by a notice which recited the claimant's notice, appointed an arbitrator on their behalf, and, an umpire being chosen, he made his award, whereby he awarded and determined that a certain sum was the value, and should be paid to the trustees "for the purchase of the fee simple in possession, free from all incumbrances, of and in the said copyhold lands" required to be purchased and taken as aforesaid. The company, being dissatisfied with the award, applied to set it aside, on the ground that the person who was tenant to the claimants had appeared before the umpire, and claimed compensation in respect of an agreement for the renewal of a lease, and on other grounds; and the Court of Exchequer held the award to be bad for uncertainty, inasmuch as the award ought to find the particular interest of the parties, whether an estate in fee or for life, and that the umpire had neither valued the interest of the claimants, nor found as a fact that they were entitled to the fee simple.

Requisites of the claim under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, s. 21.

North Staffordshire R. Co. v. London.

But where a claimant required the company to settle the amount of compensation to be paid to him "for the fee simple in possession" of land in the occupation of J. L., and the umpire by his award gave compensation for "the absolute purchase of the fee simple in possession of the land, and also for the immediate possession thereof," it was objected on behalf of the claimant that the award assumed that the claimant was in possession, and that it was therefore bad; but the Court said the answer was, that such assumption, if actually made, was in the claimant's favour and to his advantage, and therefore no matter of complaint for him. And further, that it did not appear clearly that any such assumption was made. The expression "fee simple in possession," in the claim, was used in contradistinction to fee simple in reversion or remainder. The compensation given could only be taken to be in respect of what was claimed; and if the tenants had any claim in respect of the actual possession of the land, their remedy was against the company, and not against the owner of the fee (b).

Care should also be taken that the claim describes the same premises as those which are the subject of the company's notice. Thus a company gave notice to the owners of certain land to treat for the purchase thereof, and the landowners thereupon sent the company a notice stating that their interest in the land was particularly described in a schedule of claim served therewith, and that they claimed a certain sum as compensation for the same, and for damage sustained by the execution of the railway, and that, upon payment of such sum, they were willing to convey all their estate in the said land, and that, if the amount were not paid, they desired the matter to be settled by arbitration, and required the company to appoint an arbitrator. In the schedule of claim annexed to this notice were included certain pieces of land (not included in the company's notice), which the owners, under sect. 93 (ante, 178), required the company to purchase as lands severed by the railway, and of less than half an acre. The company then gave the landholders a notice, whereby, after reciting their notice, they appointed an arbitrator, to whom was to be referred the amount of compensation to be paid to the landowners "for the purchase of the said lands." The umpire received evidence of the value of the pieces of land, less than half an acre, and awarded one entire sum for the purchase of the fee simple of the land which the company required to purchase, and also of the portions of land which the owners required the company to purchase; but it was decided that the award was bad, there being no valid submission in respect of the last-mentioned lands (c).

Claimant should give notice if he requires the whole of his premises to be taken.

And it is also to be observed that if the company give notice of their intention to take a part only of a house or other building, in a case where by force of the 92nd section they may be compelled to take the whole of the premises (d), it is the duty of the owner or other interested party forthwith to give the company notice that they are required to take the whole; because it has been decided that sect. 92 is not imperative on the company to take the whole, unless the owner requires them to do so (e).

As to disputed compensation.
Sect. 22.

We will now assume that the party interested in the lands gives no notice to the company, and takes no step to treat under sect. 21: in such a case, the company are authorized to deal with the case as one of disputed compensation.

As to disputed compensation, sect. 22 enacts, that if no agreement be come to between the company and the owners of or parties by the act enabled to sell and convey or release any lands taken or required for or injuriously affected by the execution of the undertaking, or any interest in such lands, as to the value of such lands, or of any interest therein, or as to the compensation to be made in respect thereof, and if in any such case the compensation claimed shall not exceed 50*l.*, the same shall be settled by two justices (f). The mode of doing this is pointed out by sect. 24 (g).

By sect. 23, if the compensation claimed or offered in any such case shall exceed 50*l.*, and if the party claiming compensation desire to have the same settled by arbitration, and signify such desire by notice in writing to the company, before they have issued their warrant to the sheriff to summon a jury in respect of such lands, under the provisions hereinafter contained, stating in such notice the nature of the interest in respect of which such party claims compensation, and the amount of the compensation so claimed, the same shall be so settled accordingly; but unless the party claiming compensation shall as aforesaid signify his desire to have the question of such compensation settled by arbitration, or if when the matter shall have been referred to arbitration the arbitrators or their umpire shall for three months have failed to make their or his award, or if no final award shall be made, the question of such compensation shall be settled by the verdict of a jury, as hereinafter provided (h).

If the claimant does not treat, the company may give notice of a warrant to assess the compensation.
8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, s. 23.

Sect. 38 requires the company to give the party ten days' notice of their intention to summon a jury to assess the compensation, and the notice must also state what amount of compensation the company are willing to pay (i).

Notice of the jury. Sect. 38.

On the receipt of this notice, the party who claims compensation has ten days allowed him to determine whether he will accept the offer made by the company, or not; and if he determines to decline the offer, he may declare his desire that the amount of the compensation shall be assessed by arbitrators, and not by a jury; for, as we have seen, by sect. 23, the party who claims compensation has, in all cases, the option of having the amount of it (if it exceeds 50*l.*) assessed by arbitrators, provided he gives the company notice thereof in due time. If, therefore, the party be desirous of referring the question of compensation to arbitration, he must take care to serve a notice on the company, stating such to be his desire, before the expiration of ten days from the day when he received the company's notice of their intention to summon a jury. After that period has elapsed, the company are authorized to issue their warrant to summon a jury (h); and if the warrant is once issued, it will be too late to require the appointment of arbitrators. It is, however, to be observed that the company have no option to require that the compensation shall be assessed by arbitrators; they can only issue a warrant to the sheriff, after having given the notice required by sect. 38.

Claimant may demand arbitration.

observe that all the steps we have hitherto pointed out are applicable to cases wherein the company may not desire to obtain possession of lands to be purchased or permanently used, until after the purchase-money and compensation are ascertained, and the amount paid or deposited in the Bank.

Company may desire to enter on lands before the purchase-money, &c., is ascertained.

Company may injuriously affect lands before compensation is assessed.

Clauses relating to entry on lands. 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, s. 84.

We must now, however, turn to a very important class of cases of frequent occurrence,—i. e. cases where the company have given a notice to treat, but desire to enter on the lands before the amount of the purchase-money and compensation to be paid is ascertained; and this will necessarily lead us to notice other cases, where the company have taken lands or injuriously affected them, by their works, without any notice,—and without having previously made satisfaction to the parties entitled to receive compensation. It will be convenient to state the clauses in the acts which relate to both these matters, before we offer any observations on the numerous decisions in the courts of law and equity, and it will be seen that the Consolidation Act is so framed, as to make it essential that both subjects should be considered together.

With respect to the entry upon lands by the company: By sect. 84 it is enacted, “that they shall not, except by consent of the owners and occupiers, enter upon any lands which shall be required (m) to be purchased or permanently used (n) for the purposes and under the powers of the acts, until they shall either have paid to every party having any interest in such lands, or deposited in the Bank, in the manner herein mentioned (o), the purchase-money or

(m) If the company give notice to take part, and the landowner require them, under sect. 92, to take the whole, the company cannot enter upon paying into Court the value of part, but must pay in the value of the whole. Giles v. London, Chatham and Dover R. Co., 30 L. J. (Ch.) 603.

(n) It has been determined, that where a permanent tunnel was made through the soil, without disturbing the surface, this amounted to a permanent using of the lands. Ramsden v. Manchester and Altrincham R. Co., 1 Exch. 723; 12 Jur. 293. In cases where the entry is unlawful, ejectment or trespass may be maintained; Doe d. Hutchinson v. Manchester, Bury and Rossendale R. Co., 14 M. & W. 687; 15 L. J. (Exch.) 208; or in some cases an injunction, post, tit. “Injunction.” But where a company agreed with a landowner that the question of compensation should be settled by arbitration, and the company, with the consent of the owner, entered upon the lands, and the arbitrators subsequently made an award, which became the subject of dispute between the parties, and the owner thereupon gave the company a notice to quit, and brought ejectment; the Court of Queen’s Bench said, that the action could not be maintained, although the company had not tendered the money awarded, or a conveyance, but that the owner’s remedy was to proceed upon the award. Doe d. Hudson v. Leeds and Bradford R. Co., 20 L. J. (Q. B.) 486; 15 Jur. 946; 16 Q. B. 796. See also Knapp v. London, Chatham and Dover R. Co., 32 L. J. (Exch.) 236.

(o) Sect. 76, post, App. 58, provides on this subject,—that if the owner of any lands purchased or taken by the company, or of any interest therein, on tender of the purchase-money or compensation, either agreed or awarded to be paid in respect thereof, refuse to accept the same, or neglect or fail to make out a title to such lands, or to the interest therein claimed by him, to the satisfaction of the company; or if he refuse to convey or release the lands as directed by the company; or if any such owner be absent from the kingdom, or cannot, after diligent inquiry, be found; or fail to appear on the inquiry before a jury; then, in either of the above-mentioned cases, the company may deposit the purchase-money or compensation payable in respect of the lands, or any interest therein, in the Bank of England, to the credit of the parties interested in such lands, subject to the control and compensation agreed or awarded to be paid to such parties respectively, for their respective interests therein: provided always, that, for the purpose merely of surveying and taking levels of such lands, and of probing or boring to ascertain the nature of the soil, and of setting out the line of the works, it shall be lawful for the company, after giving not less than three, nor more than fourteen days' notice to the owners or occupiers thereof, to enter upon such lands without previous consent, making compensation for any damage thereby occasioned to the owners or occupiers thereof" (p).

Sect. 85 provides, "that if the company shall be desirous of entering upon and using any such (q) lands before an agreement shall have been come to, or an award made or verdict given, for the purchase-money or compensation to be paid by them in respect of such lands, it shall be lawful for the company to deposit (r) in the Bank, by way of security, as hereinafter mentioned, either the amount of purchase-money or compensation claimed by any party interested in or entitled to sell and convey such lands, and who shall not consent to such entry, or such a sum as shall, by a surveyor (s) appointed disposition of the Court of Chancery in England, or the Court of Exchequer in Ireland. By sect. 77, when the money has been thus deposited, the cashier of the Bank is required to give the company a receipt for the same; and the company may then, if they think fit, execute a deed-poll containing a description of the lands, and declaring the circumstances under which the deposit has been made; "and thereupon all the estate and interest in such lands of the parties, for whose use and in respect whereof such purchase-money or compensation shall have been deposited, shall vest absolutely in the company, and as against such parties they shall be entitled to immediate possession of such lands." Where an act empowered a company to summon a jury in cases where the owner of lands failed to disclose his title, and, an owner having failed to comply with the act in this particular, a jury assessed the amount of compensation, and the company, without calling upon him to produce his title, paid the amount of compensation into the Bank, in pursuance of a clause similar to the 76th section, and took possession of the lands; it was held, that the company were not authorized to take this step. Rolfe, B., observed,—“After the compensation was assessed, the company were bound to call on the owner to show his title; and until they do so, they have no right to take possession of the land by paying the amount of the compensation money into Chancery. Neither the letter nor the spirit of the act bears out such a construction, and it would be most unjust if it did.” Doe d. Hutchinson v. Manchester, Bury and Rossendale R. Co., 14 M. & W. 687; 9 Jur. 949; 15 L. J. (Exch.) 208.

Where a company entered upon land and drew a trig line along it, without the consent of, and without having given any notice to the owner, whereupon he filed his bill and applied for an injunction, and the company having stated that they entered upon the land solely for the purpose of making a survey, and that they did not intend to proceed any further, without giving the requisite notices, the Court refused to make any order on the motion, but reserved the costs. *Fooks v. Where a bond was given, and the estimated value of the land deposited under the 85th section, and the amount of the purchase-money was afterwards determined by a jury and paid to the parties entitled, who executed a conveyance of the lands to the company, Lord Cottenham, C., determined that the owners of the land had no lien on the money deposited by the company, for certain costs relating to the holding of the inquiry and making the conveyance, and also of a suit instituted against the company. T. Kindersley, V. C., on these facts said, that though the corporation were bound by the acts of their contractors, the acts done were not a taking possession within the meaning of the act, and that the bill was improperly filed. *Standish v. Thus we see that the company may enter upon lands without the consent of the owners, provided a deposit of money be first made in the Bank of England, and a bond be also given (l); and further, that if any lands are taken or injuriously affected by the company's works, and for which the company may not have made satisfaction, a summary remedy for the recovery of such satisfaction is given by the statute.

We proceed to notice the decisions upon these important matters, —and, first, it is incumbent on the company, when they seek to avail themselves of the powers of entry, after a deposit made, and bond given, to be able to show clearly and satisfactorily, that they have fulfilled all the conditions contained in the statutes; for the Courts have always been disposed to give the benefit of any doubt on this point to landowners, whose control over their own property is so seriously interfered with. Thus, it has been ruled that the bond should be given in the very terms of the statute. In a case where the bond instead of being conditioned for “payment to the party, or deposit in the Bank for the benefit of the parties interested,” was conditioned for “payment to the party, his heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, and for deposit in the Bank of England, or otherwise, for the benefit of the parties interested, as the case might require, under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act,” it was decided that the bond was not in compliance with the statute, by reason of the introduction of the words “or otherwise.” Parke, B., said:—

“If the only objection had been, that, instead of being conditioned for payment to the plaintiff simply, it introduces the words ‘heirs, executors, administrators and assigns,’ I should have doubted whether it was bad on that account (m), for it is in effect implied from the nature of the bond that, if the plaintiff dies, payment shall be made to the party entitled to the estate; that is, if freehold to his heirs, if leasehold to his executors. Then, with regard to the other objection, I think that the words ‘or otherwise’ are not authorized by the act of Parliament. The words of the act are plain. The bond is to be conditioned ‘for payment to the party, or deposit in the Bank for the benefit of the parties interested,’ and no more. That is required before the company are authorized to enter upon the land, and difficulty arises from introducing equivalents. I conceive that a great difficulty might be imposed on a plaintiff, in the event of his being obliged to sue on a bond conditioned for payment in any other way than that provided by the act of Parliament. The 85th clause requires only two modes, either payment to the party himself, or deposit in the Bank of England. There is no doubt about the proper form, and these companies would exercise a wise discretion if in future they would confine themselves to the terms of the act” (n).

*Poynder v. Great

So where the condition was, if the obligors “do and shall on demand well and truly pay, or cause to be paid to the plaintiff, his heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, or do or shall on demand deposit in the Bank of England” the amount of the purchase-money or compensation when it should have been determined: Lord Cottenham, C., although the plaintiff might be considered rather a gainer than a loser by the departure in the form of the bond from that strictly prescribed by the act, continued an injunction until the company should have given a bond in conformity with the provisions of the act (o).

(m) See on this point Dakin v. L. and N. W. R. Co., 3 De Gex & Sm. 414, where a bond given to a leaseholder in this form was objected to; but no intimation appears of the opinion of Sir K. Bruce, V. C., who sent that case to law.

But where the company were dealing with a lessee of lands, in respect of his individual interest therein, and, no agreement being made between the parties, the company gave a bond conditioned for payment by the company "to the lessee, his executors, administrators or assigns, or for the deposit in the Bank of England, as the case might require, for his or their benefit, under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, of all such purchase-money or compensation as may, in the manner by the same act provided, be determined to be payable by the company in respect of the interest of the said lessee in the said hereditaments:" Lord Cottenham, C., held that the bond was sufficient, and that it was not necessary to use the alternative form. His Lordship observed:—

"The company have dealt with the party as the owner of the lease; this they were perfectly competent to do. If they agreed with him, and ascertained the value of the leasehold interest, having bought his lease at a price so agreed on, they were not bound to look to any other parties; because they, at their own risk, deal with him as owner of the lease, and he claims as such owner. Still, as he is only owner of the lease, the company have to require from him, before he can receive the value of the land taken, the performance of certain acts by which their title is to be completed. He must assign to them the lease; he must part with that which they have purchased, before he can call upon them to part with the purchase-money. The mode in which the question arises here is, that the company only require to have the money kept in medio, until the time shall come when the lessee shall be advised to entitle himself to the money, upon the terms of doing all that he is compellable to perform before he can receive the money. The bond, therefore, provides, precisely for that event; nor do I know in what language that can be better provided for. It may be true that the party was not entitled to receive the whole of the money; that is to say, the company might have dealt with him as a party under the provisions of the act, not under his estate, but under his power of selling; but that is not the case here. The company have dealt with him in respect of his own interest, and are willing to deal with him and to purchase his interest, only requiring to have the means, as against him, of compelling him to deal with that interest so as to vest it in themselves. Now the case of Poynder v. Great Northern R. Co., (ante, 194,) has been compared to this. I have looked at it several times in order to find out the similarity, and I cannot discover it. The company did not, in that case, deal with the party as having the beneficial interest; but, on the contrary, the bond was in the general terms of the act, which is in the alternative, so that it might embrace the particular interest, or any other interest. The money might be paid into Court, not for the benefit of the party with whom they contracted for a particular interest, but for security, and for the benefit of those entitled to other interests in the land. And the difficulty as to the bond there was, that, although the money appeared to be paid into Court upon both alternatives, in the language of the act, it was made payable to the party on demand, so that there was an inconsistency in the condition of the bond. It did not appear that it was paid in on account of the owner of the land, but on one or other account, and yet it was made payable to him on demand. The objection felt to that condition was, that, though the money was payable to one individual, there was nothing to show that that individual was the party entitled" (p).

If tenants in common are interested in the lands, it seems that the company should deal with them separately for their respective interests, and that it would be irregular to pay one sum into the Court of Chancery to the joint account of all the tenants in common, or to execute a bond conditioned to pay the compensation to them jointly (q).

If the lands are in mortgage, the company should communicate with the mortgagee as well as with the mortgagor, and if no agreement be made, and the company desire to enter on the lands, they should pay into Court and give bond, for a sum of money sufficient to meet all claims which the mortgagee may be entitled to enforce. In a case where a company having notice that lands required by them were mortgaged, and that the mortgage could not be paid off until a certain future day, and the company, nevertheless, merely paid the purchase-money into Court, upon the ordinary valuation, to the credit of the mortgagor, and entered upon the lands without negotiating with the mortgagee, Lord Langdale, M. R., decided, that the company, not having provided for the expenses of re-investment, or for the costs of the mortgagee, or any compensation for the difference of interest, in pursuance of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18. s. 114, had wrongfully taken possession of the lands, and he granted an injunction to restrain them from prosecuting the works (r).

And the bond should be given and the deposit made in respect of all the lands described in the notice to treat, for a company cannot, as we have seen, recede from their notice (s).

But it is important to observe, that the company may give a second bond, if the first be informal or insufficient, and even amend the description of the lands therein, and make a new deposit; or they may amend a defective proceeding, by causing a jury to be summoned to assess the compensation to be paid for that portion of the lands in respect of which they have not paid a deposit. In all cases of this description, whatever the liabilities of the company may be at law, a Court of Equity will not grant an injunction against them, after they have substituted a valid bond, on the ground that the original possession taken under the defective bond is not a taking of possession under the act. In a case where this point was urged before Lord Cottenham, C., he said,—

“There was another objection, that, inasmuch as possession had been taken of this land before the bond was given, it is not a taking possession under the act. It might come to this, that the 85th section could never apply at all, if there was any mistake in the bond. It is impossible to maintain this; and, although this Court has very beneficially interfered to prevent abuses of powers by these great companies, yet there must be something like equity as the foundation for the Court's interference upon the mere abuse of power, which is the ground for injunction. But here the party is asking, by a construction to be put upon the 85th section, to strike that section entirely out of the act. Now, if the Court finds the means of doing justice between the parties, it will not interfere, except under such rules and provisions as may be equitable for that purpose; and the Court, therefore, will not deal with an injunction otherwise than for the purpose of seeing that each party has that to which each party is entitled. Here is possession erroneously taken; it is supposed erroneously taken, because the provisions of the bond are not according to the act; but in Poynder v. Great Northern R. Co. (ante, 194), possession was also taken under a bond, which I thought was not within the provisions of the act. In that case, however, I dealt with the possession (whether taken de novo, or to be continued in the hands of the company, not being material) as a possession under the provisions of the act. The company giving the owner of the land all the benefit the act intended he should have, the Court did not treat the possession as not according to the provisions of the act, but dealt with it as being within the act itself. I consider that not only as correct under the terms of the act, but as a point upon the act decided in that, and, I believe, in other cases"(t).

Whenever objections are made on the ground that the proceedings of the company are irregular, a landowner, who goes into equity to complain of the insufficiency of the bond, deposit or other proceeding under the statute, should state the whole of his case in the first instance. Thus, where the original objection was that the company had given an informal bond, and had proceeded to enter upon part only of certain lands contained in a notice, Lord Cottenham, C., refused to grant an injunction, where, in a later stage of the proceedings, the landowner set up a new ground of equity, viz., that the company were bound to take the whole of a manufactory, by virtue of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, s. 92 (u).

All objections

The next subject for our consideration is, the manner of proceeding to have compensation assessed, after the company have thus taken possession of lands without the consent of the owner, under the 85th section.

Mode of proceeding to obtain
compensation.

It was at one time doubtful, whether the onus of taking the initiative steps to have the purchase-money and compensation assessed lay upon the owner of the lands or upon the company; but Lord Cottenham, C., decided (x), that, under the 68th section (y), the

(t) Willey v. South-Eastern R. Co., 1 Macn. & Gord. 58. Lord Cottenham also observed, that a difficulty might arise in this case, as to the period from which the interest was to be calculated, i.e. "from the time of entering on such lands," under the 85th section—whether this should be, from the time when the original possession was taken, or from the time when the possession was set right by the substitution of another onus lay upon the owner. That learned judge said, he was of opinion that this section was intended to cover every case in which the company, whether by right or wrong, or by any other means, had got into possession of property for which they had not paid, or in the exercise of the powers of the statute had injuriously affected the property of others, for which injury they were bound to make compensation. In all cases falling within this section, the company, being in possession, and not having paid the compensation, were not left to their own discretion, or to the pressure of their own wants, to induce them to summon a jury; but a remedy, prompt and effectual, was given to the owners to compel them to do so. This remedy was, to make a claim pursuant to the 68th section, stating the amount of compensation required, and if the company did not enter into an agreement to pay the same, or proceed to arbitration, or within twenty-one days issue their warrant for a jury, as the case may be, they were liable to pay the sum claimed to be recovered, with costs.

This decision was subsequently received with approbation in the Court of Queen's Bench (z), and it may now be taken as settled law that the owner may, in all such cases, avail himself of this short and simple remedy for obtaining compensation from the company, and he seems to have this remedy in addition to his right to a mandamus.

If matters of equity are pending, proceedings under section 68
will be stayed.

But if questions in equity arise, they must be determined before the common law remedy can be resorted to. Thus, where lessees gave the company a notice to take the whole of a manufactory, and the company waited until their lease had expired, and then deposited money and gave a bond, whereupon the lessees, who had continued in possession, took proceedings under the 68th section, and it appearing to the Court that there were matters of equity to be determined, before it could be known what was the subject matter the jury were to have submitted to them as the ground of the claimant's demand of compensation, an injunction was granted to restrain the proceedings until the rights of the parties had been determined (a).

It seems that under section 68
no notice need be given by company of their intention to issue a warrant.

Questions have arisen as to whether the various clauses in the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, which refer to the proceedings before arbitrators and juries, and which are embraced in a series of sections relating to these subjects (b), are applicable to cases arising on the 68th section, as well as to ordinary cases. The Court of Queen's Bench determined that sect. 38, which requires the company to give ten days' notice of their intention to cause a jury to be summoned, does not apply to a proceeding under section 68 (c), and a plea in answer to an action brought on that section was held to be sufficient, wherein the company alleged that they issued a warrant within twenty-one days after the receipt of the plaintiff's notice that he desired to have the question of compensation settled by a jury, without adding that they had given the plaintiff any notice of their intention to do so (d). On the other hand, it was decided in the Exchequer Chamber, affirming a decision in the Court of Common Pleas, that sects. 51 and 52, which provide for the payment of the costs of an inquiry before a jury, are incorporated with sect. 68 (e), and that a party who claimed compensation, having demanded a jury, and recovered a larger sum than the company had previously offered, was therefore entitled to recover the costs of the proceedings. The Court said, on affirming the judgment, "It is not necessary for us to say whether we concur in the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas, that Railstone v. York and Berwick R. Co. was wrongly decided, for that case may be good law and yet the decision in this case may be also correct."

But the provisions as to costs apply to section 68.

It is also to be observed, that a party cannot take proceedings under the 68th section, unless his lands have been actually taken, or actually injuriously affected. If, therefore, a company give notice of their intention to take lands, but do not afterwards actually take possession or injuriously affect them, but refrain altogether from taking any steps to carry out their intention, the remedy of the owner is to apply for a writ of mandamus to compel the company to assess the purchase-money and compensation. It has been decided, that the owner or other party injured cannot in such a case make a demand of a certain sum, under the 68th section, and afterwards bring an action to recover the amount demanded, on the default of the company to issue a warrant to the sheriff (f).

Lands must be actually taken or injuriously affected before section 68 can be enforced.

The Court of Exchequer said on this point,—

"The question here is, what is the meaning of the words 'lands taken for the execution of the works?' For it is to such lands alone that the clause applies. It has been determined upon several occasions by Lord Cottenham, and, independently of his high authority, we entirely concur in that opinion, that when a company, as here, give notice to a party that they require his lands for their works, it amounts to an agreement by them for the purchase of those lands, assented to by the opposite party (g), on the terms of making the compensation in the way appointed by the act, under which such notice is given, and binds both parties finally. In some sense, therefore, lands upon such notice being given, may be described as lands taken for the execution of the works. And so in one case the Court of Queen's Bench called them, and we think correctly. But the point is, whether the 'lands taken,' in the 68th section, mean lands actually taken into the possession of the company, and those alone; and after carefully considering the various clauses of the act preceding the 68th section, we have arrived at the conclusion that this is the correct construction. These preceding provisions really exhaust the whole of the cases in which the company gives notice of requiring the lands of the owners adversely, when the company requiring them are not in the possession of the lands, and can only obtain that possession upon payment of the ascertained compensation. But another class might exist and require to be provided for, in which the above provisions could not be applied, and that was the class when the company had been permitted to take possession without any distinct agreement for compensation, or when, in the execution of their works, injury, not originally in the contemplation either of the company or of the owners, was actually incurred. And the literal meaning of the words 'lands which shall have been taken or shall have been injuriously affected,' not 'lands which shall be taken, or shall be injuriously affected,' clearly, we think, points to this clause alone. Independently therefore of the argument, not an unimportant one, that the construction contended for would not give full effect to both the 23rd and 68th sections, but make them in some degree inconsistent, we have come to the conclusion that upon the true construction of the 68th section, the words 'lands taken,' &c., include only lands actually taken or actually affected injuriously by the company, and consequently that these lands, not having been so taken, this action cannot be sustained against the defendants."

No injunction lies if lands are injuriously affected by works on the company's own lands.

It is also important to observe, that where lands are actually injuriously affected by the company, in consequence of works in the course of construction on their own lands, or on the lands of other parties not complaining, the party sustaining the injury cannot obtain an injunction on the ground that he has received no notice, and no offer of compensation, if it appears that the company are only exercising the statutory powers entrusted to them. In cases of this description, the claimant should allow the works to be completed, and then take proceedings under the 68th section (h).

Hutton v. London and South-Western R. Co.

On this subject Sir J. Wigram, V. C., said,—

"One question to be answered was, whether it was lawful for the company to commence those works before they had made compensation. The Court would not interfere to restrain companies from executing their lawful powers, unless there was some special equity to the contrary, arising out of some agreement or circumstances. If the lawful powers were not exceeded, the Court would not interfere.

(g) But see as to the words in italics, Haynes v. Haynes, 30 L. J. (Ch.) 578; 1 Dr. & Sm. 426.

(h) It was objected in Langham v. Great Northern R. Co., 1 De Gex & Sm. 486; 5 Railw. C. 263; 16 L. J. (Ch.) 437, that the company, in executing their works, would greatly alter the appearance of the land,

(which the company had entered upon under section 85,) and that a jury would not be likely to assess sufficient compensation to the owner, if they were called upon to give a verdict, after the damages were sustained, but Sir K. Bruce, V. C., said, this was no ground for the interference of equity.

The question here must be answered by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, and the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act. In the case of the purchase of land, the 84th section of the former act provided that the price was to be paid before entry, and the 85th section provided for cases where the company, wanting immediate possession, and before the time of payment, were allowed, upon having the amount ascertained in the mode pointed out by the act, paying the money into the Bank, and giving a bond to enter upon the land before the price was actually paid. Those were the important clauses as applicable to the present case. But the case of damages, consequential upon the exercise of the powers of the company upon their own land, or upon the land of other persons not complaining, might stand in a different position from that of damages which were consequential on a purchase, and must be determined by the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act. That act required the company to make compensation to all persons whose interests were injuriously affected by the acts of the company. There was some difficulty arising out of the language of several of the clauses of this act in construing them so as to bring every case within them. Several sections of that act had reference to the question of compensation. The question in this cause arose under the 44th section, which said the company should make compensation, and that the amount of compensation or damages should be ascertained in the way pointed out by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, but did not say whether the damages should be ascertained before the company began the work upon their own land, or at any time afterwards. In Lister v. Lobley (i), the judges were unanimously of opinion that it was not unlawful for a company to commence works (provided they were within their powers), although they might be attended with damage to others, before making or tendering compensation for expected damage. That case was an authority in point. The ground upon which the Court there proceeded was the impracticability of knowing, in many cases, whether damage would or would not be sustained from the unlawful acts of the company; and, if it was certain that damage would follow, the difficulty of measuring the extent of it. Upon carefully reading through the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, it will be found that, in many of the cases specified, it would be absolutely impossible for a jury to measure the damages which a company might be bound to tender before the work was commenced. To such cases the reasoning of Lister v. Lobley was applicable, and was unanswerable" (k).

Works may be commenced before compensation.

If a party proceeds to enforce the provisions of the 68th section against the company, on the ground that his lands have been injuriously affected, equity will not grant an injunction to restrain the proceedings, on an allegation that the injury supposed to have been sustained by the claimant is not the subject of a legal claim within the meaning of the statute (l).

An injunction will not lie on the ground that no damage for which compensation is awarded has been sustained.

But although an injunction cannot be obtained, it is now settled that, if the claimant proceeds against the company under the 68th

But it is a good plea to an action brought on the 68th section, to allege that no such damage has been sustained.

section, the company may allege as a defence, to an action on the award or inquisition, that the claimant has sustained no injury for which the statute has given compensation (m). In a very similar case, where an act provided that, in case of dispute “as to the amount of any compensation,” an arbitrator might be appointed to assess it, the Court held, that the jurisdiction of the arbitrator did not apply to cases where the liability to make any compensation at all was to be tried; and an award was set aside on that ground. Erle, J., in delivering judgment, said, that “by the 68th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, which had been referred to during the argument, the question, whether lands had been injuriously affected or not, was left by that section to the ordinary courts;” and Crompton, J., agreed that it would be a good traverse to an action brought on that section, to say that no damage had been sustained (n).

II. Powers to take temporary Possession of Lands.

damnified by refusing to summon a jury, or appoint an arbitrator when they are required to do so, because when an action is afterwards brought to recover the sum demanded, it is, as we have seen, a good plea that no damage has been sustained by the plaintiff. But as exorbitant claims may be made under sect. 68, in cases where the claimant's legal right to demand compensation may be extremely doubtful, the company would become liable to pay the whole of the claim, on failing to establish the plea that no legal damage whatever has been sustained. In such cases, therefore, the proper course seems to be, that the company should take the necessary steps to have the compensation assessed; and then appear before the arbitrators or jury, under protest, if necessary, and contest the claim. For the purpose of obtaining materials therefrom, for the construction or repair of the railway, or such accommodation works as aforesaid ; or

For the purpose of forming roads thereon, to or from or by the side of the railway ;

And, in exercise of the powers aforesaid, it shall be lawful for the company to deposit, and also to manufacture and work upon such lands, materials of every kind used in constructing the railway, and also to dig and take from out of any such lands any clay, stone, gravel, sand or other things that may be found therein, useful or proper for constructing the railway or any such roads as aforesaid, and, for the purposes aforesaid, to erect thereon workshops, sheds, and other buildings of a temporary nature : provided always, that nothing in this act contained shall exempt the company from an action for nuisance or other injury, if any, done in the exercise of the powers hereinbefore given, to the lands or habitations of any party other than the party whose lands shall be so taken or used for any of the purposes aforesaid : provided also, that no stone or slate quarry, brick-field, or other like place, which, at the time of the passing of the special act, shall be commonly worked or used for getting materials therefrom, for the purpose of selling or disposing of the same, shall be taken or used by the company, either wholly or in part, for any of the purposes lastly hereinbefore mentioned.

And, by sect. 33,—In case any such lands shall be required for spoil banks or for side cuttings, or for obtaining materials for the construction or repair of the railway, the company shall, before entering thereon (except in the case of accident to the railway, requiring immediate reparation), give three weeks' notice in writing to the owners and occupiers of such lands, of their intention to enter upon the same for such purposes (p); and, in case the said lands are required for any of the other purposes hereinbefore mentioned, the company shall (except in the cases aforesaid) give ten days' like notice thereof; and the company shall, in such notices respectively, state the substance of the provisions hereinafter contained, respecting the right of such owner or occupier to require the company to purchase any such lands, or to receive compensation for the temporary occupation thereof, as the case may be (q).

Owner, &c. may object to lands being used for temporary purposes.

If lands are required for spoil banks, side cuttings, or for obtaining materials, the owner or occupier may, by giving notice in writing to the company within ten days after he has received the before-mentioned notice from the company, object to the company using the lands; and the objection may be, that the lands or materials are essential to be retained by the owner (r), or that other contiguous lands would be more fitting to be used (s): (Sect. 35.) If the former objection be made, two justices may inquire into the truth of such ground of objection, and, for special reasons to be assigned, may order that the lands shall not be used by the company; and, after service of the justices' order on the company, they cannot take or use, without the previous consent of the owner, any of the lands or materials which they are ordered not to take or use: (Sect. 36.) If the objection be, that other contiguous lands which the company are authorized to use, would be more fitting to be used, then the owners and occupiers of such contiguous lands, and the company, may be summoned to appear before two justices, and they may determine, summarily, which of the lands shall be used: (Sect. 37.) Or the justices may adjourn the inquiry, and summon any other person who may appear to have lands which the company are authorized to take, and then finally determine which lands shall be used: (Sect. 38.) The owner or occupier of lands required for spoil banks, side cuttings, for obtaining materials, or for forming roads, may require the company to execute a bond, with sureties, conditioned for the payment of compensation; and a justice may decide any difference as to the amount of the penalty, &c.: (Sect. 39.) Before any lands or roads can be used, the company are required, on the request of the owner or occupier, to fence off the lands and roads, and to put up convenient

If lands are taken for the purpose of getting materials, the company must work the same in such manner as the surveyor or agent of the owner may direct, or, in case of disagreement, as a justice may direct: (Sect. 41.) In all cases where the company enter upon lands to make spoil banks, side cuttings, or to take materials, the owners or occupiers of the lands, or parties having such estates or interests therein as, under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, would enable them to convey the lands to the company, may, at any time during the possession of such lands by the company, and before such owners or occupiers have accepted compensation from the company in respect of such temporary possession, serve a notice in writing on the company (t), requiring them to purchase the said lands, or the estates and interests therein, capable of being sold and conveyed by them respectively; and in such notice such owners or occupiers shall set forth the particulars of their estate or interest in such lands, and the amount of their claim in respect thereof; and the company shall thereupon be bound to purchase the said lands, or the estate and interest therein capable of being sold and conveyed by the parties serving such notice: (Sect. 42.)

Owners may, in certain cases, require the company to purchase lands required for temporary purposes.

Sect. 42.

If any of the cases aforesaid, where the company shall not be required to purchase such lands, and in all other cases where they shall take temporary possession of lands by virtue of the powers in the acts granted, it shall be incumbent on the company, within one month after their entry upon such lands, upon being required so to do, to pay to the occupier of the lands the value of any crop or dressing that may be thereon, as well as full compensation for any other damage of a temporary nature, which he may sustain by reason of their so taking possession of his lands, and shall also, from time to time, during their occupation of the said lands, pay half-yearly to such occupier or to the owner of the lands, as the case may require, a rent to be fixed by two justices, in case the parties differ, and shall also within six months after they shall have ceased to occupy the lands, and not later than six months after the expiration of the time by the special act limited for the completion of the railway, pay to such owner and occupier, or deposit in the Bank for the benefit of all parties interested, as the case may require, compensation for all permanent or other loss, damage, or injury that may have been sustained by them by reason of the exercise, as regards the said lands, of the powers in the acts granted, including the full value of all clay, stone, gravel, sand, and other things taken from such lands: (Sect. 43.)

determined, and the money applied, in the manner provided by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act for determining the amount and application of the compensation to be paid for lands taken under the provisions of that act: (Sect. 44.) This subject is treated of in another part of this Chapter (u).

Entry on lands to repair accidents, &c., by the authority of the Board of Trade.

After a railway is completed, the company may, in certain cases, enter on adjoining lands for the purpose of preventing accidents and of repairing the railway; and in some cases, lands not included in the schedules annexed to the special act may be taken under the compulsory powers of the act; but in all these cases a certificate from the Board of Trade must be obtained by the company in accordance with 5 & 6 Vict. c. 55, ss. 14 and 15 (x).

III. Powers to take temporary Possession of Roads.

Powers to take temporary possession of private roads within 500 yards of the railway.

8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 30, App. 81.

The company are also authorized to make a temporary use of certain private roads. By the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act it is enacted, that, subject to the provisions therein, and in the special act contained, it shall be lawful for the company at any time before the expiration of the period by the special act limited for the completion of the railway, to enter upon and use any existing private road, being a road gravelled or formed with stones or other hard materials, and not being an avenue or a planted or ornamental road, or an approach to any mansion-house within the prescribed limits, if any, or, if no limits be prescribed, not being more than five hundred yards distant from the centre of the railway, as delineated on the plans; but, before the company can enter upon or use any such existing road, they must give three weeks' notice (y) of their intention to the owners and occupiers of the road, and of the lands over which the same shall pass, and must in such notice state the time during which, and the purposes for which, they intend to occupy such road; and such compensation must be paid as may be agreed upon, or, in default of agreement, then the amount is to be settled by two justices in the same manner as compensation not exceeding 50*l*.

Power to owners to object that other roads should be taken. Sect. 31.

But the owners and occupiers of any such road, and of lands over which the same passes, may, within ten days after the service of the aforesaid notice, by notice in writing to the company object to the company making use of the road, on the ground that other roads, such as the company are hereinbefore authorized to use for the purposes before mentioned, or that some public road, would be more fitting to be used; and, upon the objection being so made, such proceedings may be had as have been already mentioned with respect to lands temporarily occupied by the company, in respect of which three weeks' notice is required to be given (z), and in the same manner as if, in the provisions relative to such proceedings, the word "road" or "roads," or the words "road and the land over which the same passes," as the case may require, had been substituted in such provisions for the word "lands:" (Sect. 31.) The powers given to the company to cross turnpike and other roads are hereafter described (a).

Temporary Occupation of Roads.

8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 31.

If the company cross, raise, cut through, sink or use any part of any road, public or private, so as to render it impassable for, or dangerous, or extraordinarily inconvenient, to passengers or other persons, or carriages, they are required, before the commencement of any operations, to cause a sufficient road to be made, instead of the road to be interfered with, and to maintain such road (b) (Sect. 53); and, in default of making the substituted road, the company are liable to a heavy penalty (c) (Sect. 54); and any person sustaining special damage may maintain an action on the case: (Sect. 55). If the road interfered with as above mentioned can be restored, compatibly with the formation and use of the railway, the company are required to restore it; if it cannot be restored, then the company are required to cause some other sufficient substituted road to be put into a permanently substantial condition; and the former road must be restored, or the substituted road provided, within a certain period, which is prescribed: (Sect. 56.) If any such road be not restored, or the substituted road completed, within the prescribed period, the company forfeit to the trustees, commissioners, surveyors, or other person having the management of the road (d) interfered with by the company, if a public road, or if a private road, to the owner thereof, 5*l*. for every day during which such road shall not be restored, or the substituted road completed; and the justices may order the whole, or any part, of the penalty to be laid out in executing the work in respect whereof such penalty was incurred: (Sect. 57.)

If in the course of making the railway the company shall use or interfere with (e) any road, they shall from time to time make good all damage done by them to such road; and if any question shall arise as to the damage done to any such road by the company, or as to the repair thereof by them, such question shall be referred to the determination of two justices; and such justices may direct such repairs to be made in the state of such road, in respect of the damage done by the company, and within such period, as they think reasonable, and may impose on the company for not carrying into effect such repairs any penalty, not exceeding 5*l.* per day, as to such justices shall seem just (f); and such penalty shall be paid to the surveyor, or other person having the management of the road interfered with by the company, if a public road, and be applied for the purposes of such road, or if a private road, the same shall be paid to the owner thereof: provided always, that in determining any such question with regard to a turnpike road, the said justices shall have regard to, and shall make full allowance for, any tolls that may have been paid by the company on such road in the course of the using thereof: (Sect. 58.)

Sufficiency of an order and conviction under this section.

An order of justices, made under this section, need not point out the particular repairs required to be done; it is sufficient to state what length of road has been injured, and to direct that portion to be repaired; and one conviction for neglecting to obey an order may, by reference to the order, include several roads situate in one parish, and need not impose a separate penalty for the non-repair of each road; nor is it necessary to refer to the special act in the conviction; it is sufficient to allege that the conviction is by virtue of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act (g).

IV. On Compensation.

By what parties compensation may be claimed.

Having thus pointed out the powers of the company,—1st, to take and purchase lands; 2nd, to take temporary possession of lands; and 3rd, to take temporary possession of roads,—we proceed to make some further remarks on the subject of the compensation which may be claimed under the statutes (h), by parties who are interested in the

Compensation.

We have already seen that the statutes give compensation, in all cases, to the owners of lands which are taken and purchased by the company under their compulsory powers (h), and also under section 68 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, in respect of lands or any interest therein which have been taken for, or injuriously affected by, the execution of the company's works (i).

And by the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, sect. 6, it is enacted, that in exercising the power given to the company by the special act to construct the railway, and to take lands for that purpose, the company shall be subject to the provisions and restrictions contained in that act and the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act; and the company shall make to the owners and occupiers of, and all other parties interested in, any lands taken or used for the purposes of the railway, or injuriously affected by the construction thereof, full compensation for the value of the lands so taken or used, and for all damage sustained by such owners, occupiers, and other parties, by reason of the exercise, as regards such lands, of the powers by that or the special act, or any act incorporated therewith, vested in the company. And by sect. 16, which authorizes the company to execute every description of works necessary for making, and repairing, and using the railway (k), it is enacted, that, "in the exercise of the powers by that or the special act granted, the company shall do as little damage as can be, and shall make full satisfaction in manner therein, and in the special act, and any act incorporated therewith, provided, to all parties interested, for all damage by them sustained by reason of the exercise of such powers.

8 & 9 Vict. c. 20,
s. 6, App. 75,

In all cases where lands are taken, it is laid down as a general rule by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act (l), sect. 63, that, in estimating the purchase-money or compensation, regard shall be had by the justices, arbitrators, or surveyors (m), as the case may be, not only to the value of the land to be taken, but also to the damage, if any, to be sustained by any owner of the lands, by reason of the severing of the lands taken from the other lands of the owner, or otherwise injuriously affecting such other lands.

Moreover, it is provided by the Railways Clauses Act, 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 92, s. 20, App.), that, where the time limited by the special act for the exercise of powers of compulsory purchase of lands,

It is also provided by the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, that if, after the company have taken possession of lands, any party shall appear to be entitled to an interest therein, and, through inadvertence, no compensation has been paid to him, the company may, within a time limited, pay compensation for the lands, and also for the loss of the mesne profits thereof; the amount of compensation to be agreed upon or awarded in like manner as if the company had purchased such interest before entry upon the land. The compensation and mesne profits must be assessed according to the value of the lands at the time they were entered upon.

Sect. 125.

Compensation for damages sustained by the temporary occupation of lands.

8 & 9 Vict. c. 20,
s. 43.

With respect to the compensation which may be claimed for damages sustained by reason of the temporary occupation of lands, under the powers conferred on the company (p), the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act provides, that in such and all other cases where the company shall take temporary possession of lands, by virtue of the powers therein or in the special act granted, it shall be incumbent on the company, within one month after their entry upon such lands, upon being required so to do, to pay to the occupier of the lands the value of any crop or dressing that may be thereon, as well as full compensation for any other damage of a temporary nature, which he may sustain by reason of their so taking possession of his lands; and shall also, from time to time, during their occupation of the said lands, pay half-yearly, to such occupier, or to the owner of the lands, as the case may require, a rent, to be fixed by two justices in case the parties differ; and shall also, within six months after they shall have ceased to occupy the said lands, and not later than six months after the expiration of the time by the special act limited for the completion of the railway, pay to such owner and occupier, or deposit in the Bank for the benefit of all parties interested, as the case may require, compensation for all permanent or other loss, damage or injury, that may have been sustained by them, by reason of the exercise, as regards the said lands, of the powers therein or in the special act granted, including the full value of all clay, stone, gravel, sand and other things taken from such lands. And here it must be remembered, that if the lands have been temporarily occupied by the company for the purpose of making spoil banks or side cuttings thereon, or for obtaining therefrom materials for the construction or repair of the railway, then the parties interested in such lands may waive their right to claim compensation under the above provision, and require the company to purchase the lands (q).

So, when the company avail themselves of the powers already mentioned (r) to use certain existing private roads, it is provided, that, before they use such roads, they must give notice of their intention (s), and pay to the owners and occupiers of the roads, and of the lands through which the same shall pass, such sum for the use and occupation of the road, either in a gross sum or by half-yearly instalments, as shall be agreed upon between the owners and occupiers respectively and the company, or, in case they differ, as shall be settled by two justices, according to the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act (t).

Compensation where roads are temporarily occupied.
Sect. 30.

There are also special provisions in the Lands Clauses Act, with respect to the compensation to be paid to lessees for years, and to tenants from year to year. Thus, if any lands are comprised in a lease for a term of years, and a part only of such lands are required for the purposes of the railway, the future rent to be paid by the tenant for the lands which are not required is to be apportioned in the manner prescribed. And every such lessee is entitled to receive compensation for the damage done to him in his tenancy, by reason of the severance of the lands required from those not required, or otherwise by reason of the execution of the works.

by two justices, in case the parties differ about the same; and, upon payment or tender of the amount of such compensation, all such persons shall respectively deliver up any such lands in their possession required for the purposes of the special act.

If any party, having a greater interest than as tenant at will, claim compensation in respect of any unexpired term or interest, under any lease or grant of any such lands, the company may require the party to produce the lease or grant in respect of which such claim shall be made, or the best evidence thereof in his power; and if, after demand made in writing by the company, such lease or grant, or such best evidence thereof, be not produced within twenty-one days, the party so claiming compensation is to be considered as a tenant holding only from year to year, and is entitled to compensation accordingly.

Special provisions are also made with respect to the compensation which is to be paid when loss or damage is sustained by owners or lessees of mines, under or near the railway.

As it has already been stated (y), the company are not entitled to mines or minerals under lands purchased by them, except such part as shall be necessary to be used in the construction of the works, unless the same shall have been expressly purchased; and such mines are deemed to be excepted out of the conveyance. If the owner, &c., of mines under the railway, or within the prescribed distance therefrom, be desirous of working the same, he must give notice to the company, and the company may then make compensation for the mines, (the amount to be settled as in other cases of disputed compensation); and in that case the mines cannot be worked. If the company do not treat, after receiving the notice, the owner may work the mines in the manner particularly prescribed; and any damage or obstruction to the railway or works, by improper working of such mines (z), must be made good by the party who works the mines: (Sect. 79.) Airways, headways, gateways, or water levels, may be made by the owners of mines, in the manner prescribed:

(z) Where a canal company sought to recover damages from the owners of a coal mine, the question turned on the construction of the Canal Act, and the court was of opinion, that the meaning of the act of Parliament in requiring coal owners to give notice to the company of their intention to work their mines within a certain distance of the canal, and the liberty given to the company to inspect the works, and to prohibit the owners, upon making compensation to them, from working within that distance, was for the purpose of enabling the company to purchase out the rights of the coal owners, if they thought their canal works likely to be endangered by the nearer approach of the miners; but, if the company declined the purchase, as they had done in this case, the coal owners were left to their common-law rights, as if no canal had been made, and they might take every part of their coal, in the same manner as they might have done before the act passed; their former rights in that respect not having been taken away by the act, which had only appropriated the surface of the land, and so much of the soil as was necessary for the cutting and making of the canal, leaving the coal, &c. to the owners, to be enjoyed in the same manner as before; and the Legislature had only given the landowners a compensation for so much of the soil as they had deprived them of. And the court said, this was not like the case s. 77 et seq.

(Sect. 80); and the owners of the land through which they are made are entitled to receive compensation from the company: (Sects. 81, 82.)

The company are required, from time to time, to pay to the owner, lessee, or occupier (a) of any mines, extending so as to lie on both sides of the railway, all such additional expenses and losses (b) as shall be incurred by such owner, lessee, or occupier, by reason of the severance of the lands lying over such mines by the railway, or of the continuous working of such mines being interrupted as aforesaid, or by reason of the same being worked in such manner, and under such restrictions, as not to prejudice or injure the railway, and for any minerals not purchased by the company, which cannot be obtained by reason of making and maintaining the railway; and if any dispute or question arises between the company and such owner, lessee, or occupier, touching the amount of such losses or expenses, the same is to be settled by arbitration: (Sect. 81.)

The company are authorized, after notice, to enter mines, and to use all necessary means to discover the distance from the railway to the mines (Sect. 83); and if they are refused admission to the mines, a penalty is incurred by such refusal: (Sect. 84.) If mines are worked contrary to the aforesaid provisions, the company may require the owner to construct such works, and adopt such means, as may make the railway safe; and, in case of refusal, the company may themselves construct such works, and recover back the expenses thereof: (Sect. 85.)

The company are empowered to remove or displace water and gas-pipes; but they must make good all damage done to the property of the water or gas company by the disturbance thereof, and make full compensation to all parties for any loss or damage which they may sustain by reason of any interference with the mains, pipes or works of such water or gas company, or with the private service-pipes of any person supplied by them with water.

Compensation.

Questions arising under the Consolidation Acts, as to compensation.

It may be observed, with reference to the provisions contained in the Consolidation Acts on the subject of compensation, that questions of considerable difficulty have arisen, and are likely to arise, as to their construction. It seems to have been the intention of the Legislature, to give full compensation to the owners and occupiers of, and all other parties interested in, land taken or used for, or injuriously affected by, the construction of the railway, for the value of such lands, and for all damage sustained by such owners, &c. It is, however, obvious that the language used in the statutes must be applied with some limitations; for it cannot be contended that railway companies are liable to make compensation for every injury, however remote such injury may be, which parties interested in lands may sustain, in consequence of the construction of the railway (c). The cases in which the right to recover compensation exists, and the principles upon which that right depends, are now better understood than they were when this work was first published. The Courts had not then been called upon to construe the compensation clauses in the Consolidation Acts, which were but recently passed. Under these circumstances, and hoping to throw light on the subject, the author collected and printed at length most of the decisions to be found in the Books which had reference to other Statutes containing compensation clauses, although those decisions relate chiefly to Canal and Dock Acts. A great number of cases have, however, since been decided upon the construction of the compensation clauses in the Consolidation Acts. It has therefore been thought better, with a view both to brevity and perspicuity, to endeavour in the present edition to lay before the reader the effect of all the decisions, as well upon Canal and Dock Acts as upon the compensation clauses in the Consolidation Acts, without giving the cases themselves at full length. In some cases, extracts are given from judgments for the convenience of reference. Some of these cases, it must be remembered, were determined upon the construction of provisions contained in particular acts of Parliament.

Arrangement of compensation cases.

The cases are considered in the following order:—

2. Compensation to lessees of lands.
3. Compensation in other cases (d).

(c) See Lord Denman's observations in R. v. Eastern Counties R. Co., 2 Q. B. 347, post, 219; and Chamberlain v. West End of London and Crystal Palace R. Co., 31 L. J. (Q. B.) 201; S. C., aff. in Exch. Ch., 32 L. J. (Q. B.) 177; 2 Best & S. 605.

(d) The Report made by a Select Committee of the House of Lords, in the session of 1845, on the mode of assessing compensation, is also annexed to the end of this Chapter, together with such extracts from the evidence taken before that committee, as appear to point out the principles adopted by surveyors in ascertaining the amount of compensation for injuries done to lands.

1 Compensation where Lands, &c., have been actually taken for, or injuriously affected by, the Construction of the Railway. Compensation.

Where lands (e), or any interest therein, are actually “taken” by a railway company for the construction of their railway or works, few questions can arise except with regard to the amount (f) of compensation to which the owner is entitled; and that is a question to be decided by the statutory tribunal to which it has been referred by the legislature. There are few, if any, reported decisions upon the subject. The reader will, however, find considerable information on the principles adopted by surveyors in assessing compensation for injuries done to lands, in the report and evidence given before the Lords’ Select Committee in the Session of 1845, which are printed at the end of this Chapter. Lands “taken.”

In a case (g) which occurred before the passing of the Lands Clauses Act, where 200 acres of titheable land were taken and converted into a canal under a private act of Parliament, it was held that, as the act contained no express provision in favour of the tithe-owner, he was not entitled to compensation for the tithes which would otherwise have issued from the land so appropriated. And Little-dale, J., said:— Tithe owner not entitled.
R. v. Commissioners of Nene Outfall.

“This is the first application I remember for a compensation for loss of tithe, sustained by a rector by reason of land having been converted to a purpose which rendered it incapable of producing tithe. If the legislature had intended that the rector should have such compensation, they would undoubtedly have introduced into the act an express provision for that purpose. Without an express enactment, it is quite clear that the rector can have no right to such compensation (h). It is

(e) “Lands” extend to messuages, lands, tenements and hereditaments of any tenure; see the interpretation clause, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, s. 3, post, App. 46.

(g) R. v. Commissioners of Nene Outfall, 9 B. & C. 875; and see R. v. London Docks Co., 5 A. & E. 163, post.

(h) Such express provisions are sometimes introduced. Thus, where a railway company were authorized to pull down houses in St. Olave’s, London, it was provided by the statute for the indemnity of the rector, in respect of his right to the tithes of 2s. 9d. in the pound on the removed buildings, that the company should pay to the rector tithes in respect of the houses removed, according to the last assessment to Lady-day preceding, equal to the loss sustained by want of occupiers, until new houses should be erected, of such annual value that the tithes thereon should be equal to the tithes payable on the buildings removed; such payments to diminish in proportion to the yearly sums actually payable for tithes on the new buildings.

The company pulled down houses, on some of which the tithes of 2s. 9d. in the pound were paid on the full annual value, on others the same had been paid by agreement, between the rector and the occupier, at less than the full annual value, and several on which the tithes had been wholly or partly remitted by the rector. It was decided in the House of Lords (reversing a decree of Wigram, V.C., 5 Hare, 605), that the object of the act was only indemnity to the clergy; that therefore the clergy were entitled to receive only what they would have received if the railway company had never interfered with the premises; that the company was liable to pay in respect of houses removed (where no others had been built in their places) such sums as were actually paid to the rector, whether by agreement or otherwise, up to the 25th of March, 1839; that the amount before then agreed upon between the rector and the occupant, and paid by the occupant, constituted the “assessment” within the meaning of the act; and that the amount of compensation must be measured thereby; and further, that, where new houses had been built and occupied, the company was insisted, that, the right of the rector to take tithe being an incorporeal hereditament, he is entitled to compensation, because he is a person interested in an hereditament. I think it is not a hereditament within the meaning of that word in this act of Parliament. It is true that he may have sustained damages by reason of the commissioners having taken the land, and thereby rendered it incapable of producing tithe. That is not a damage which the law considers as constituting any injury to the rector. There must be a damage accruing from the wrongful act of another to constitute a civil injury. If the owner of the land had suffered it to lie waste, and thereby rendered it incapable of producing tithe, the rector would sustain a damage, yet he could not maintain any action against the landowner, because the damage would not have been caused by any wrongful act. The commissioners have probably purchased the soil from the former owner, and thereby acquired the rights of owners. If that be so, they are entitled to use the land in such a manner that it shall not produce tithe."

Lands, &c., injuriously affected.

A great number of cases have arisen since the Lands Clauses Act, where lands, &c., have been "injuriously affected," and to these it is now proposed to direct the reader's attention; first premising that it may be considered perfectly clear that where a company have power to execute works injuriously affecting lands, &c., upon making compensation, they may proceed to commence their works before making or tendering compensation (i).

General rule.

*Caledonian R. Co.
v. Colt.*

"It is well settled," said Lord Campbell, in a recent case (k) in the House of Lords, "that the statutory tribunal, which the legislature has provided where losses are sustained in the formation of railways, is only established to give compensation for losses sustained in consequence of what the railway company may do lawfully under the powers which the legislature has conferred upon them; and that for anything done in excess of those powers, or contrary to what the legislature in conferring those powers has commanded, the proper remedy is a common law action in the common law courts." Such an action, however, can only be sustained by an individual who has actually sustained damage by the company exceeding their powers. If he has merely reason to apprehend that he will sustain damage by the company exceeding their powers, he may file a bill in equity for an injunction. But if he has sustained no damage, and there is no reason to apprehend that he will sustain damage, notwithstanding his being nearer to the possible cause of injury than the rest of the public, he has no peculiar position or claim to entitle him to become the redresser of a public grievance, or to complain of the disregard of entitled to be credited (in reduction of its general liability to make compensation under the act) with the sums which had become payable in respect of such new houses, and not merely with those which had been actually received therefrom. London and Blackwall R. Co. v. Letts, 3 H. L. C. 470. Tithe rent charges are now recover-

the provisions of an act of Parliament. Proceedings in such case must be taken on the part of the public by indictment; or in equity by information by the Attorney-General (l).

Compensation.

The principles above laid down are always acted upon. In order, therefore, to ascertain whether any particular injury is the subject of compensation or of an action, the first question to be decided is, whether or not the act causing the injury is one which the railway company may lawfully do under their acts of Parliament. If it is a lawful act, compensation must be sought under the compensation clauses. If it is not lawful, redress must be sought by an action. But, as we shall presently see, compensation can only be claimed from the company when the circumstances are such that, if the act causing the injury had not been authorized by act of Parliament, the company would have been liable to an action.

Act causing injury must be authorized by statute.

Where the act causing the injury is one which the company may lawfully do, the next question which arises is, whether the injury done is of such a nature as to entitle the claimant to compensation, as it by no means follows that every person injured by the lawful acts of a railway company is entitled to compensation. Where, for instance, the damage or injury is common to all the Queen's subjects, no one of them can maintain an action (m), but if any one has sustained private and particular injury beyond the rest of the public, inasmuch, as in respect of that injury he might, but for the act of Parliament, have maintained an action, so, under the act of Parliament, which legalizes the act complained of, he is entitled to compensation (n).

And injury must give cause of action, but for statute.

But let us proceed to consider the cases on these subjects. By a local act, 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. lxxxii, a waterworks company were empowered to make and continue waterworks, weirs and other like works in the parish of L., and to enter upon all lands, &c., specified in the plans and books of reference, and to do all other things necessary for making the waterworks. A plan describing the line of the works and the lands, and books specifying the owners, were to remain with the clerk of the peace. The company were also empowered to agree for the purchase of lands, &c.; and tenants for life, &c., and owners of lands, through which the works were to pass, were to receive satisfaction for the value of the lands, and the damages sustained in making the works. T. was tenant for life of a water-mill in L., on the river Leen. In 1826 the company were in possession of works for raising water from the Leen. The local act passed in

Old Water Works

Removing a weir.

1827. In 1830 the company removed a weir, which had been placed across the river, to a part of the river higher up, and at the same time heightened the weir, in consequence of which the working of the mill was obstructed, and the value of the property lessened. In answer, it was sworn that neither the new weir nor the site was referred to in the plans or books of reference; that none of the plans or books showed that the company sought to obtain the power of changing the site of the weir, or raising it, or in any way altering the height of the water in the Leen, or diminishing the power or value of the mill. It was not, however, denied that the parts of the river Leen on which the mill and the new weir respectively stood were comprehended in the plans.—It was held that the owner of the mill was entitled to compensation, and Lord Denman said:—The erection of this weir seems directly within the powers given by the act; and the act might be pleaded by the company in justification. This appears to be the very case contemplated by the act. The other judges concurred.

*R. v. Eastern
Lowering public road.

In R. v. Eastern Counties R. Co. (o), which was argued upon a return to a mandamus, requiring the defendants to assess compensation to a landowner, where a public road adjoining the land of the applicant was lowered by the defendants under the powers of their special act, whereby access to the land was impeded, and additional fences rendered necessary; it was held that the landowner was entitled to compensation, although none of his land had been taken for the purposes of the act. And Lord Denman said:—

“The point is, whether the compensation clause in sect. 29 be large enough to include the case of the applicant, none of whose land has been used by the company (p). It is observable, that no question arises upon sect. 9, which empowers the company to conduct their undertaking, their powers being, not only to take land, but also to alter, raise or lower any roads or ways for their convenience, ‘making full satisfaction, in manner hereinafter mentioned, to all persons,’ &c. ‘interested in any lands which shall be taken, used, or injured, for all damages by them sustained in or by reason of the execution of the act.’ Upon which clause it is important to remark, first, that it in terms comprehends cases of injury independent of taking land; and next, that it is assumed that the satisfaction to be so

(o) 2 Q. B. 347; S. C., 2 Railw. C. 736. See also Chamberlain v. West End of London and Crystal Palace R. Co., supra, note (n).

(p) The argument urged on behalf of the defendants in this case was, that the damage and injury complained of were a necessary consequence of acts which the statutes authorized the company to do, and that in such cases no action will lie. The leading cases on these points are Governor of British Plate Manufacturers v. Meredith, 4 T. R. 794; Boulton v. Crowther, 2 B. & C. 703; and see Pilgrim v. Southampton and Dorchester R. Co., 7 C. B. 205; and Lord Truro’s remarks in L. and N. W. R. Co. v. Bradley, 6 Railw. C. 551, post, 225. It will, however, be seen that the ground of distinction between this class of cases and those which have been decided on the Consolidation Acts is, that, by the latter, the companies authorized to construct the works are required, in certain cases, to make compensation for damages sustained by the execution of their works; and the real difficulty is to define with exact precision the kinds of injuries which fall within 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, s. 68, and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 6,—a matter still left in considerable obscurity.

made (which, if the parties cannot agree, must refer to the compensation clause) is to extend to all the cases of injury enumerated, one of which, as we have just observed, is injury to any person, whether his land be taken or not. It is observable also, that the 36th section also plainly refers to cases wherein a jury may be summoned to inquire into 'loss or injury' 'sustained, or supposed to be sustained, in consequence of the execution of any of the powers of this act,' without any mention of the taking of land, provided a certain notice by the claimant has been previously given. It now remains for us to consider whether, although the alleged injury be within the 9th section, and it is there assumed that such injury is within the compensation clause, the language is so restricted as necessarily to exclude it from that clause. The language of it (sect. 29) is, 'And for settling all differences which may arise between the said company and persons interested in any lands which shall be taken, used, damaged or injuriously affected by the execution' of the act, it is enacted, that 'if any of the parties entitled to receive such purchase-money, or other compensation as aforesaid, shall refuse to accept such purchase-money as shall be offered,' a jury is to be summoned, and such jury 'shall inquire of and assess, and give a verdict for the sum of money to be paid for the purchase of such lands, and also the sum of money to be paid by way of compensation, either for the damages which shall before that time have been done or sustained as aforesaid, or for or by reason of the severing or dividing the same from other lands, whereof, wherein or whereto any such 'persons as aforesaid shall be seised, possessed of, or interested in.' Then follows, 'which satisfaction, recompence or compensation for such damage or loss shall be inquired into and assessed separately and distinctly from the value of the lands so to be taken or used as aforesaid.' Now it must be admitted, with reference to this part of the section, that what the jury is specially directed to find is applicable to the case of land taken, and of some ulterior damage thereupon. And the argument is, that, because that precise injury is specially provided for, all others are virtually excluded. On the other hand, it is to be observed, that the words 'damaged or injuriously affected' may, and we think ought, to extend to injuries mentioned in the 9th section, and to this injury amongst the rest. We also think, that where the purpose to give compensation in such a case has been so clearly expressed, every fair intendment ought to be given to effectuate that intention. Before we conclude, we shall advert to an argument much pressed upon us,—that, if we make this rule absolute, any injury to land, at any distance from the line of railway, may become the subject of compensation. If extreme cases should arise, we shall know how to deal with them; but, in the present instance, the alleged injury is to land adjoining a road which has been 'lowered' under the provisions of the act, and which is therefore land injuriously affected by an act expressly within the powers conferred upon the company. A peremptory mandamus must therefore be awarded."

Upon similar principles (q), in a case in which the plaintiff occupied a cottage and a small piece of land on a level with and abutting on a public high road, from which a short way or passage over the plaintiff's land afforded access to his cottage, and a railway company, in the execution of the works of their railway, lowered the public high road seven feet, leaving the plaintiff's land and cottage on the edge of a precipice of that height, and thereby obliging the plaintiff to make use of a step-ladder in order to obtain access from the public high road to the way or passage leading over his land to his cottage; it was held by the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Ireland, that the injury complained of by the plaintiff, being an injury of a permanent nature to his land, was the subject of compensation under the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 6, and 14 & 15 Vict. c. 70, and that an action was not maintainable.

Tuohey v. Great Southern and Western R. Co.
 Raising public road.

And, upon the authority of that decision, in another case (r), in which the plaintiff occupied a dwelling-house abutting on a public high road, and a railway company, in the execution of the works of their railway, raised the public high road to the height of ten feet opposite to the plaintiff's house, whereby the access to the plaintiff's house was impeded and the house rendered damp and unwholesome by rain and mud, which penetrated into it from an adjoining bridge, and the plaintiff in consequence lost his health; it was held, that, the defendants' acts being lawful and the injury to the plaintiff's house of a permanent nature, and the loss of his health consequent thereupon, the plaintiff's remedy was by seeking compensation pursuant to 14 & 15 Vict. c. 70, and not by an action.

Again, in the following case (s), the plaintiff was held entitled to compensation under the Lands Clauses Act.

Glover v. North Staffordshire R. Co.
 Crossing private roads.

At the trial, the jury found a special verdict, which stated the following facts:—The plaintiff, during the time of the construction of the works of the company, was and is the owner and occupier of the premises mentioned in the declaration, which are two miles from the town of Longton, in which latter place the plaintiff carried on the business of a brewer; that the property consists of a house and sixty acres of land, comprising pleasure grounds, &c.; that the plaintiff became the purchaser of this property twelve years ago, and shortly after began to improve it by laying out gardens; that in 1847 the plaintiff commenced building the present house upon the property, which was finished and fit for occupation in 1849, when the plaintiff went to reside therein; that the whole sums expended on the improvements and house amounted to 4,000*l.*, of which 2,000*l.* were expended before the Act of Parliament was applied for; that the house and lands are approached by two roads, the one leading from Longton, and the other from the town of Fenton; that the roads are private roads only, passing over the property of third parties, but that the plaintiff and the occupiers of the said farm had a right of way over the same as appurtenant to the farm for passing on foot and with carriages; that the said roads form the only access to the premises of the plaintiff; that the owner and occupier of a cottage has also a right of way over the Longton Road; and two other persons, owners and occupiers of other adjoining premises, have a right of way over the Fenton Road; that the property of the plaintiff is situate on the west side of the Trent and Mersey Canal; that the towns of Longton and Fenton are situate on the east side of the canal, and the two roads converge as they approach the canal, and unite and are continued as one road over a bridge erected over the canal, and thence to the premises of the plaintiff; that the defendants are a company incorporated, and in 1847 proceeded to construct the railway, and in so doing carried the same across the said two above-mentioned roads on the level, and at a point to the east of the place where the two roads unite, and which is distant 115 yards from the nearest point of the land of the plaintiff, and 350 yards from his house; that the railway so made across the roads consists of four lines of iron rails, in an oblique direction, and form a double line of railway; that the railway crosses the said roads in a direction nearly north and south, and in such a direction that a person standing on the roads where they are intersected by the railway could not see a train approaching, until within a few seconds of its arrival at these points; that there are no signals or other means of indicating when trains are approaching; that there is a gate on each side of the said railway upon and across each of the roads; such gates are kept locked under the provisions of the act, and that a key of them is kept by a servant of the company, who lives about 130 yards from the gate; that the plaintiff has a key which will open the gates, as also the said other persons having a right of way; that by reason and in consequence of the facts hereinbefore stated, and of the said execution of the works by the company, the property of the plaintiff was before and at the time of the giving to the said company of the said notice in writing, and still is, depreciated in value. Lord Campbell, C. J., said:—

Compensation.
Glover v. North Staffordshire

Crossing private

"It is clear that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment. The property is depreciated in value by the company doing that which would be actionable, unless they were protected by the powers of their act. I agree that this affords a very fair criterion of the right to receive compensation. No doubt there may be a loss arising from the making of a railway, which would not support a claim of compensation, because the act might be one which would be legal without the powers conferred by the act. But this is not such a case. This interference would have given a cause of action against a private person, and it has depreciated the plaintiff's property, which is therefore injuriously affected by it. The erection of the gates and the passage of the trains are both acts done to the prejudice of the plaintiff, and to the diminution of his right."

And in another case of a similar nature, Lord Cranworth, V. C., dissolved an injunction which had been granted in equity to restrain the party injured from proceeding to recover compensation (t), and said:—

“Here the alleged grievance is personal to the complaining party only, and not extending generally to all her Majesty’s subjects, as in Smith’s case (u). It was argued for the company in that case, that the 68th section applied, not to damage occasioned by the works having been made, but only to such damage as was produced by the work while in the progress of execution; and here, it was said, the claim was wholly for the damage occasioned by the existence of the railway as a completed work, whereas in Gattke’s case (x), some part of the compensation claimed was for the annoyance produced by the works while in progress. To this argument there appear to be two answers: first, there is nothing on the face of the notice served on the plaintiffs in this case, which would exclude the defendant from giving evidence of, and obtaining compensation for, damage to him during the progress of the works, as well as since the completion of the railway; and secondly (and on this I mainly rely), that the question, whether, under the 68th section, the defendant is entitled to compensation for damage resulting from the existence of the railway as a completed work, is a purely legal question, to be settled in the ordinary course of legal proceedings, without the intervention of this Court. I may add further, that, if there were any validity in this distinction, the Lord Chancellor, in Gattke’s case, would not have altogether dissolved the injunction, but would have only so modified it as to make it applicable to so much of the defendant’s claim as related to the injury arising from the railway having been made, for there, as in this case, a part at least of the damage for which Gattke sought relief had been occasioned, not by the works while in progress, but by the railway having been completed; and, not being able to discover any distinction in principle between this case and Gattke’s, I shall certainly act on that decision, and dissolve the injunction which I granted before that case had been decided.”

Cutting off stream.

Where the plaintiff was in possession of a farm and in the enjoyment of a stream of water flowing through his land which he used for irrigation and other purposes, and the defendants in the construction of their railway cut off the stream, as they had power to do under their special act; it was held, that this was a case for compensation in the manner pointed out by the statute, and not by action (y).

Draper’s goods damaged by dirt and dust, &c.

Similar principles were acted on in the following case (z). The defendant was a draper and furrier, and the question in the suit arose out of his claim for compensation, as being injuriously affected by the execution of the works of the railway company. The damage alleged to have been sustained by the defendant was in consequence of the dust and dirt occasioned by the company having damaged his goods, and by reason of his customers having been compelled by the obstruction occasioned by the plaintiff’s works to quit the side of the road upon which the defendant’s shop was situated, before they arrived at his shop, and to cross to the opposite side of the road in order to pass along; by reason whereof, during several weeks, he had sustained a great loss in his trade. The defendant also alleged that he had been injuriously affected and injured by the company having stopped up a passage, along which he was entitled to a right of way to the entrance at the back of his premises. No part of the defendant's premises were inserted in the schedule to the company's special act, and no part of them had been taken, used, or at all interfered with, by the works of the company, except as aforesaid.

Gattke's case.

The defendant had commenced an action against the company to recover 400*l.*, under sect. 68 of the Lands Clauses Act; and the company had obtained an injunction to restrain this proceeding, which the defendant now sought to set aside. Lord Truro, C., said:—

“The first and most important point is, whether, upon the correct construction of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, the defendant is within the class of persons entitled to compensation, that is to say, is he the occupier of lands that have been injuriously affected by the works of the company.”

“The only sections of the act of Parliament, that appear to have any particular relation to this question, are 22nd and 68th, which are to the following effect.”

His lordship read these sections.

“I am not aware that these two sections have ever received a judicial construction; but it appears to me that sections and expressions contained in other acts of Parliament, of the same import as those on which the questions in this case depend, have come in judgment. The rules of construction which have been applied to railway acts and other acts of the same nature are, that they are to be liberally expounded in favour of the public, and strictly as against the company. The authorities for these rules are so numerous and well known as to render a particular mention of them unnecessary.”

After commenting upon R. v. Eastern Counties R. Co. (a), his lordship said:—

“The material words of the 9th section in that case are, ‘the said company are to make full satisfaction to all persons interested in any lands which shall be taken, used or injured, for all damages sustained by reason of the execution of the powers granted by the act.’ Upon comparing these words with the words of the 68th section of the 8 Vict. c. 18, I think they cannot be distinguished, and that the same construction must apply to both. The question which arises upon the sections which I have compared is the same; and that question is, whether compensation is limited to damage sustained by persons whose lands, or a part of whose lands, are to be taken, used, or directly interfered with; or does the right to compensation extend to consequential damage. The judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench was deliberate and considered, and the Court acted upon it by directing a peremptory mandamus to the company to issue a precept. The 68th section of the act now in question expresses the same meaning, and ought therefore to receive the same construction, especially when it is remembered that the judicial construction of the words I have referred to was pronounced in Michaelmas Term, 1841, and the Lands

Gattke's case.

Clauses Consolidation Act was passed in 1845, so that it cannot be reasonably supposed that the framers of that act were not aware of that judicial construction, and still less that the framers of the act under which the company was incorporated were ignorant of it, and who, if the compensation to be given were intended to be more restricted than the decision of the Queen's Bench comprised, would doubtless have procured some legislative enactment more distinct and expressive of the intended limitation.

"The only ground of equity raised by the bill is founded upon the question, whether the 22nd and 68th sections entitle any other persons to compensation than those whose lands are taken, used, or directly interfered with, to the exclusion of the right to compensation of all persons whose lands are not so affected; but, as I before stated, I think the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench a satisfactory answer to that question, and that the only ground of equity fails, and that the injunction ought therefore to be dissolved.

"It was strongly argued that L. and N. W. R. Co. v. Smith (b) governed the present case, and that this injunction cannot be dissolved without overruling that decision. If the question in this case was the same as that determined in the case referred to, I should yield to its authority, because I do not think it would be proper for me to overrule a former recent judgment of this Court, as such a course of proceeding would introduce great uncertainty in the law of the Court. I may, however, state that I should not deem it right to extend the application of the principle of that decision. I therefore disclaim the intention to overrule that decision.

"I however think this case distinguishable, because in that case compensation was claimed solely upon the ground of the injurious effect resulting from the permanent stoppage of what at the time of the company's acts complained of was a public highway, no damage or injury being sustained by the claimant but what in a greater or less degree applied to all the Queen's subjects. The only question, therefore, was a question of law, and which seems to approximate very nearly to the question decided in R. v. Bristol Dock Co. (c).

"It has also been assumed, in the argument, that the compensation jury have no

(b) 1 Macn. & Gord. 216; 5 Railw. C. 716. There the complaint of the defendant was, that the company had carried their railway across a public street, which by their act they had authority to do, but by so doing they had greatly incommoded the inhabitants of one end of the intersected street, making access to their houses much less convenient than it had theretofore been. Smith, as one of the inhabitants, made a claim for compensation, and gave the notice for summoning a jury; and the company filed their bill to restrain Smith from proceeding on his notice, on the ground, that the act complained of was not one in respect of which they were liable to make compensation at all. The Vice-Chancellor of England refused an injunction; but Lord Cottenham, C., on appeal, granted it; and the ground of his decision appears to have been, that the Court would not permit a party to put in force the power given him by the act for assessing the amount of his damage, until he had first established his legal right to receive some compensation, that is to say, until he had shown that the damage complained of was damage in respect of which sect. 68 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act entitled the party to redress. Lord Cottenham does not appear to have decided whether the case was one which entitled the defendant to compensation or not. His Lordship said—"Here is a party whose house and premises are likely to be, more or less, affected by the works of the company. Those works are directly authorized by the Act of Parliament, and they may or may not injuriously affect the owner of those houses. If the company are liable to him, it is obvious that they may be also liable to his neighbours, and the proportionate injury to the several houses in the same street must be difficult to ascertain. It is important, however, to decide the general question, which, being one of law, ought not to be determined in this Court."—An injunction was accordingly granted, with liberty to the defendant to bring an action to establish his right to recover damages. jurisdiction to decide upon the question of right; but during the many years that compensations have been assessed (that is, ever since the passing of the London and West India Docks Acts, fifty years ago), questions upon the construction of the compensation clauses have constantly arisen before the Recorder of London and other presiding officers, and of necessity they have been decided by him and the jury. Such questions of construction have incidentally and directly arisen and been decided; and of necessity, for they cannot be anticipated. The jurisdiction of the jury has been frequently recognized. In R. v. Lancaster and Preston Junction R. Co. (d), the jury found that the claimant had sustained 'no damage,' and upon application for a mandamus to compel the company to issue a new precept, the Court refused so to do, and thereby upheld the inquisition.

Gatlke's case.

"In this case, as I see no reasonable doubt that if the defendant has in fact sustained damage from the causes alleged, he is a person entitled to claim compensation, and that he is entitled to have the question submitted to a jury, the injunction must be dissolved with costs."

And where a tunnel was made so near a public-house that the beer in the cellars was made unfit for consumption by reason of the vibration caused by trains passing, the owner was held entitled to compensation (e). The facts were these. The defendant was possessed of a public-house, called the Crown Tavern, and several shops, dwelling-houses, and other buildings, in Huddersfield. The plaintiffs, in exercise of their powers, constructed a tunnel, which formed part of the line of railway, and immediately adjoined the north-western extremity of the defendant's premises. The defendant alleged that his hereditaments and his interest therein were damaged and injuriously affected by the construction of the tunnel, and the execution of the works, for that the passing of the engines and carriages through the tunnel caused considerable tremor and vibration through the whole of the buildings belonging to him, especially in the public-house, and that, in consequence thereof, beer placed in the cellars became thick and unfit for consumption; that the tremor and vibration caused could be sensibly felt in every part of the inn, and caused glasses to jingle on the shelves; that previously to the construction of the tunnel the inn was well accustomed, and the tenant thereof, who was the defendant's brother, was doing a considerable business thereat, but since such use of the tunnel the business had declined. Under these circumstances, the defendant proceeded to recover compensation from the company, under the 68th section of the Lands Clauses Act. The company thereupon applied for an injunction to restrain the proceedings, which was granted by Lord Cranworth, V. C., upon the authority of L. and N. W. R. Co. v.

Smith (f). Lord Truro, C., however, dissolved the injunction, saying:—

“I have a very strong opinion upon this case. I took much care and pains in forming my opinion before I delivered my judgment in Gatthe's case (g), and I think that the principles of that case are applicable to this. It appears to me that the interference of this Court would, in the present case, be in the highest degree mischievous, for it would amount, not only to a denial of justice, but to the infliction of positive injustice. This is a question of pure legal right; the defendant insists that, under the construction of certain acts of Parliament, he has sustained an injury, for which they give him compensation. It is the object of these acts to give compensation in certain cases for certain injuries, and they prescribe the mode in which compensation shall be recovered for these injuries; and while the statutes give a form in which compensation is to be sought, they also in effect deprive the party of all other legal remedy; for I think I may venture to assert, that in no case in which a man would be entitled to work out his compensation under an act can he maintain an action. The very circumstance of the act prescribing a mode of recovering compensation, pre-supposes that the thing in respect of which compensation is given, is authorized to be done under the act, leaving the parties with all their legal remedies unaffected in respect of any proceedings not authorized by the act of Parliament. This is, therefore, purely a question of the legal construction of these acts of Parliament. The legislature having prescribed a certain form of proceeding only, I must suppose, independently of decision, that it conceived, when it created that particular tribunal, that that tribunal was vested with the power of determining whether there was to be compensation or not.”

After discussing the various sections in the act, his lordship proceeded:—

“Whether an action will lie on behalf of a man who sustains a private injury by the execution of parliamentary powers, exercised judiciously and cautiously, is not an easy question, or rather, it is not easy to come to a conclusion that an action will lie. I entertain a decided opinion (probably, however, erroneous) that no such action will lie. I do not entertain anything like so decided an opinion that a claimant may not work out his claim in the way in which he proposes to do; he may or may not. It is well worthy of his consideration, looking at the very imperfect manner in which these acts are prepared—taking the two acts together—taking the 6th section of the 8 Vict. c. 20, which refers to obtaining compensation for certain matters, and speaks of compensation by reason of the exercise of certain powers given by the special act, whether, when you come to compare the compensation which the parties under the 6th section are entitled to with the particular words which are used in the earlier part of the 68th section, the words do so correspond as to make the course by arbitration as safe as the course by jury. That is for them to consider. It may or may not be so; but, at all events, I dare say they are well advised in the course which they have taken.

“The main question is, whether this Court can, as I said before, interfere to prevent a claimant from pursuing a legal right by a legal course, it not being imputed to him that there is anything vexatious in it, or that he is making anything more than a fair attempt to obtain the decision of a court of law upon the claim he sets up. It is clear that the defendant in the present case has sustained an injury, and that too by the operation of an act of Parliament. He is the owner of a public-house, which is well known generally to be of more value than a house of the same size, not used as a public-house. When the landlord comes to sell his interest in this house, it will sell for so much the less if people cannot use it as a public-house. Therefore his interest is materially affected by the value of his property being actually reduced. He cannot sell his house in future for a public-house if the vibration is such that the publican cannot keep his beer in a fit state for his customers. That the man, therefore, has sustained an injury is clear; but whether it is of such a nature as to entitle him to compensation, or whether it must be borne, with the view of obtaining the larger benefit to the public, is another circumstance. It may or may not be so; but, at all events, a man has a right to take the opinion of a court of law (his injury having been caused by that which could not have been done safely without the powers of an act of Parliament), whether Parliament has or has not given him compensation."

And, upon similar principles where a canal company were empowered by act of Parliament to construct a reservoir, raising the water to a certain height, it was said by the Lord Chancellor, upon an application for an injunction by a person whose lands were injured by the water overflowing, that if the damage to the plaintiff's lands was the inevitable result of the proper execution of the works, causing an occasional flooding in contradistinction to a permanent submerging, he must be left to his remedies under the 68th section of the Lands Clauses Act, which was incorporated in the special act (h).

So where the access to an ancient ferry was obstructed by a railway company, the owner was held entitled to compensation (i). The facts were, that the Great Northern Railway Company, in 1848, made and constructed a portion of their line of railway along the west bank of a cut or river called the Fossdyke, in Lincolnshire. The owner of certain lands gave the company notice that he required compensation in respect of his interest in the lands, as owner in fee-simple, and that the manner in which such lands had been injuriously affected was by the disturbance of and cutting off the communication with the ancient ferry attached and belonging and held with the lands in question, and by erecting another ferry near to such ancient ferry belonging to him; by all which said acts they had considerably reduced the profits of his said ancient ferry. The company having issued their warrant, the claimant contended before the jury that he was entitled to compensation in respect of the obstruction of the ferry; and he proved that he had sustained damage in respect of the same; and the jury awarded 380*l.* as compensation.

Re Cooling.

In discharging a rule for a certiorari to remove the inquisition, Patteson, J., said:—

“Cooling claims compensation from the Great Northern Company in respect of an injury to land held by him in fee, in the city of Lincoln. The injury, if any, is occasioned by the works of the company, in the county of Lincoln, on the other side of the Fossdyke, by cutting off the communication on the Lincolnshire side with a ferry, said to belong or be appurtenant to the land of Cooling. Objection is made that this case is within the principle of R. v. London Dock Co. (k), where it was held that the destruction of houses and public roads in the neighbourhood of a public house, by which the custom of the house was diminished, was not the subject of compensation. But the present case is quite distinguishable. Here the ferry is a private right, and if it be attached to the land of Cooling, the value of that land is seriously affected. The question is whether it be so attached. Cooling is not the owner of the water nor of the landing-places, as it should seem, on either side, certainly not on the Lincolnshire side. But it is not essential to a ferry, that the owner of it should have the land on either side, if he has the right of using that land for the purpose of the ferry (l). And the evidence of user here for many years is abundant to show such right. Under all the circumstances we think the jury were justified in coming to the verdict that it did.”

R. v. Thames and Isis Navigation Commissioners.

Towing-path impeded.
Loss of tolls.

A navigation company was empowered by their special act to make new cuts and otherwise improve a navigable river: and the act gave compensation to persons aggrieved, damaged or injured “by any work made by the commissioners, or by the operation or effect of any such work.” On a bend in the river there was an ancient towing-path, belonging to the owner of the adjoining land. The commissioners made a short cut from one extremity of the bend to the other, so that the ancient towing-path was no longer frequented, whereby the owner was deprived of his tolls, and the navigation of that part of the river was impeded: It was held, that the owner of the towing-path was entitled to receive compensation (m).

Lord Denman, C. J., in awarding a peremptory writ of mandamus to the commissioners, to pay money awarded for compensation, said:—

“The cause shown by the commissioners in their return is, that the damage described is not, within the statute, a grievance. Their argument was, that a mere diversion of custom from the owner of a towing-path, who lets out his horses to be used there, can be no more considered as an injury than could the loss of guests brought upon the owner of an ancient public house, by making a new road, cutting off a bend by which the house stood. We were referred to authorities where a claim somewhat similar was held inadmissible (n). The answer is to be found in the very peculiar language of this statute, which differs altogether from the which an appeal lays, ibid.

numerous acts of the same nature which were sent to us after the argument (o). We might have found little difficulty in deciding that such damage could not give the sufferer the denomination of a party aggrieved. And though the remedy is provided for the party who thinks himself aggrieved, and that question is sent to the Quarter Sessions, yet those words would probably have not been held extensive enough to prevent our judgment, that such damage was no grievance. But the clause empowers every one who may think himself aggrieved, damaged or injured by any work made by the commissioners, or by the operation or effect of any such work, to apply for compensation to the commissioners, who are to make such order, determination and judgment thereon as to them shall seem just, and give such satisfaction to the party complaining as to them shall seem reasonable. Lord Boston asks for compensation and is refused. On his appeal to the sessions, that Court is invested with cognizance of the cause, and enjoined to make such order thereon as seems just; a much wider power than merely to assess damages for some recognized injury. Can we say that they have done wrong in deciding that the damage has accrued by the operation and effect of works done by the commissioners? On the contrary, to assert that it has not, would have been a direct untruth, in the ordinary sense of the words; and no other sense is attached to them by any clear legal authority. Another objection of a technical kind was relied on—that the jurisdiction of the sessions did not attach, because the commissioners had come to no order, determination or judgment, from which an appeal would lie. On the facts, we have not the least hesitation in saying, that the refusal to accede to Lord Boston's application, or to hear any evidence in support of it, was a plain determination that he was not entitled to what he claimed, and consequently a proper subject of appeal. This is one of a class of cases which has become exceedingly numerous, in which the Court has found itself constrained to give the words of a private act an effect probably never contemplated, and very probably not intended by the legislature which enacted it. But our duty is to look to the language employed, and construe it in its natural and obvious sense. The liabilities thus imposed on themselves by bodies of men are the conditions upon which the public empower them to perform works expected to be beneficial to both contracting parties. We are not at liberty to inquire whether the bargain is reasonable, but are bound to see it executed."

It has also been held, by the Court of Queen's Bench (p), that a brewer, the owner in fee of a public house let on lease with the usual restrictive covenant to take beer, &c., from the landlord, was entitled to compensation from a railway company who took and pulled down the house under their act of parliament, for the additional value of the premises by reason of such restrictive covenant.

which notice they were empowered to give under the Canal Act, and the company had purchased of the lessor all his interest in the coals so reserved: It was held, that the lessee was nevertheless entitled to receive compensation for the loss of the profit which he would have made on the coal, if he had not been thus restrained from working the colliery (r), and the Master of the Rolls said:—

“I am of opinion, that the defendant, under his lease, had an interest in the coal under the eight yards on each side of the canal; he had a right to get the coal and sell it, upon paying the sums which became due to Mr. Beaumont. Upon this dealing, there might have been profit, which he is prevented from making. The value of the coal in the bed, or the price paid to the coal-owner, can be no compensation to the coal-worker for the loss of the interest which he had acquired. The ground on which it is argued that he should have no compensation is, that when he took his lease he had notice, or was informed by the act of Parliament, that he was not to work the coal so as to injure the canal. But, at the time when he took his lease, he had no notice that the plaintiffs would require eight yards of breadth of coal to be left on each side of the canal. The coal under the canal was not comprised in his lease, and he had no interest in it; but he did not know that the plaintiffs would require more or less than the eight yards, or, indeed, any breadth of coal, on each side of the canal. He knew that he was not, by working his coal, to injure the canal; he also knew that the plaintiffs were entitled to inspect his workings, and, if he worked contrary to the directions of the act, were entitled, at his expense, to make the repairs rendered necessary by his improper working; but as the plaintiffs did not think fit, for so many years, to give any notice as to the quantity of coal, if any, which they required to be left, it does not appear why the defendant might not enter into an agreement for working and getting all the coal comprised in his lease. I think it very probable that the powers given by the act might have been so exercised as to enable the plaintiffs to buy the coal under the canal, and a reasonable distance on each side of them, at the value of the coal in the bed; but, for reasons of their own, they probably desired to delay the notices as long as they could; they left it quite uncertain whether they would or would not require any coal to be left for the safety of the canal, and I think that they cannot justly complain of any rights which the coal-owners may have conferred on the coal-workers during the time that their notices were delayed for their own convenience. And, under the circumstances, I am of opinion, that the defendant lawfully acquired an interest in the coal which the plaintiffs desire to be left for the safety of the canal.”

Cromford Canal
Co. v. Cutts.
Mines.

Again, in a case (s) in which a notice had been given by a canal company to a mine-owner not to take coal near the canal, and the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act was subsequently incorporated with the Canal Act, Lord Cottenham, C., refused to continue an injunction to restrain the coal-owner from proceeding to have the damages assessed by arbitration, saying:—

“If the coal-owner sustains injury, by getting less coal, or by working in a less beneficial manner, for the sake of not injuring the canal, he will, in the same manner as if he be under notice to leave a third of the coal, or a pillar, have a right to compensation. The question is, whether the defendants are to be restrained from taking any proceeding to have the amount of compensation for coal claimed, in consequence of the notice given to the company, settled by arbitration, and from in any other manner enforcing, or taking any proceeding to enforce, the payment of the compensation for coals claimed by the defendants.

Compensation.
Cromford Canal
Co. v. Cutts.

“Now to decide that question, it is not necessary to come to any conclusion as to the rights of the parties in regard to the matters in difference between them. But, to resist this motion, the plaintiff must show such an equity as entitles him to an injunction. The conclusion to which the Vice-Chancellor came was, that there was an equity, because, under the act, the coal passed to the company, and that the defendants had no right to compensation for any coal under the canal, and that the owner must have received compensation at the time the canal was made; but the facts of the case do not support any such equity, and I cannot come to that conclusion, which is inconsistent with the terms of the act. The 34th clause provides, ‘that nothing herein contained shall affect the right of the owners of land through which the canal shall be made to the mines and minerals lying within or under the lands to be made use of for the canal,’ &c.; but all such mines and minerals were thereby reserved to such owners of land, and it should be lawful for such owners of land (subject to the conditions and restrictions therein contained) to work, get, &c. such mines and minerals, ‘not thereby injuring, prejudicing, or obstructing the canal.’ Now, that clause, read by itself, is free from any ambiguity. The owner of land may work and carry away the coal, provided he does no harm to the canal in getting it. That is a restriction on his right; whether the company purchase the coal or not, he is restricted from getting it, if he thereby injure the canal. It is necessary, in any event, that he should provide, at his own risk, against any mischief to the canal. Then the 35th section provides, that if the owner or worker of any coal or mine should in pursuing such mine work near or under the canal, so as in the opinion of the company to endanger or damage the same, or in the opinion of the owner or worker of the mine to endanger or damage the further working thereof, then it should be lawful for the company to treat and agree with the owner or worker of all such mines or minerals as might be near or under the canal, and should be thought proper to be left for the security or preservation of the canal or mine as aforesaid, and in case of disagreement, certain commissioners were appointed to assess the amount of compensation. The plaintiff says he has an equity to restrain the defendants, because they are using the machinery for ascertaining compensation under the modern acts, for a purpose not contemplated by the Canal Act. The owner is entitled to take his coal, but not so as to injure or destroy the canal. The 34th section expressly says he may take so much as he can, consistently with the rights of the canal company. It may be proper, for the safety and preservation of the canal, to take some part, and leave other parts of the coal. The damage may be partial only, or he may be obliged to work in a less beneficial manner; and then the 35th section applies, and the machinery of the act is put in operation, to ascertain how much the coal owner is prejudiced. There might be a case where no damage to the owner would accrue. If the coal-owner’s power and control over his mine be not interfered with by the rights vested in the company, then it will not be necessary to put in operation the machinery of the act, if the damages be merely imaginary; but I have it in evidence that the agents of the company at one time thought there would be injury to the canal by the defendants working their coal. The claim made by him may exceed the amount of compensation to which he is entitled, or it may not. I do not know how much may be recovered by the owner; but, when the machinery provided by recent acts was not in operation, the defendants were unable to assess the amount of their claim. They are now entitled to proceed, not for the purpose of seeing whether the company like to purchase the coal or not, but to ascertain whether there be or not any injury either to the owner of the coal, or the canal company.

Compensation.

Co. v. Cutts.

"The amount of damage is a matter of evidence, but the ground on which the plaintiff comes for an injunction is, that there is no injury. If I had been satisfied that no injury would arise, and that there was no damage to the defendants, I might have interfered. But it is clear that it was at one time thought, by both parties, that injury would arise; and I cannot say the defendants are wrong in submitting this case to the proper tribunal, to ascertain how much compensation they are entitled to, that tribunal being expressly provided to decide matters of right between owners of the mines and the company. I do not see that the Vice-Chancellor gave an opinion on this part of the case, as he decided that the owner must be presumed to have received compensation. The injunction granted by him must therefore be dissolved."

Fletcher v. Great Western R. Co.
Mines.

And it has been held (t) that a railway company having purchased land for the purposes of their railway, under the Lands Clauses Act and the Railways Clauses Act, by a conveyance in the usual statutable form, in such cases is not entitled to exclude the owners of the mines from working them without paying compensation, and such compensation having been assessed regularly under the acts, the owners may recover the amount in an action. And Pollock, C. B., said:—

"The construction of the clauses in the act is clear, that unless the mines and minerals are expressly purchased they shall be deemed to be excepted out of the conveyance. They were not so purchased: the conveyance is in the form given by the act, consequently the company have taken the land as if the mines and minerals were excepted. They belong, therefore, not to the company, the owners of the surface, but to the owners of the land. The 78th section enacts, that the mines near the railway shall not be worked if the company are willing to purchase them. In that respect it puts all the world on the same footing, whether they are grantors or strangers. But if the company are unwilling to purchase them, then the owners may work them, which means, that if the company desire to exclude the owners from working the mines they can, by taking the proper course, do so. If they do not, then they may go on working the mines without doing unnecessary damage."

R. v. Leeds and Selby R. Co.
Future damage to mines.

Where a company purchased land to form a railway, all minerals being reserved to the vendor, and no claim was then made by him for compensation in respect of future damage which might result, it was held, that when the works of an adjoining colliery belonging to the vendor approached the land on which the railway was made, the lessee of the colliery could not claim compensation; as the extent of the colliery was capable of being known at the time of the purchase of the land, and the claim ought then to have been brought forward (u).

Canal Co. v. Dudley, 30 L. J. (Q. B.) 108, upholding Dudley Canal Co. v. Grazebrook, 1 B. & Ad. 59, from which it seems that where there is a clause in an act of Parliament directly pointed to the getting of coal

And in a case (x) in which a colliery was inundated with water in consequence of a railway company having diverted the course of a brook, it was held that the owners of the colliery were entitled to compensation; and that the damage having been partly done under the powers of an act of Parliament, and partly not, the proper remedy was by mandamus to compel the company to assess compensation. The facts were these. The complainants, Messrs. Gratton, were the owners of certain collieries, and in 1830 had made an adit, from a stream called Smith's Brook, for the purpose of watering and laying dry the coal, and the water pumped up from the mine had been accustomed to run off along the adit into Smith's Brook; the complainants had worked the colliery from 1830 to October, 1838, when they were prevented from getting any more coals, in consequence of the coal-works being filled with water; the defendants, in proceeding to carry the powers of their act (6 & 7 Will. IV. c. cvii) into execution, had altered and diverted the course of Smith's Brook into a new course, upon much higher ground, and had thereby caused the water to flow up the said adit, and also to flow into the outcrop of the coal, and from thence into the coal-works, in such large quantities as to render it impossible to work the same. Messrs. Gratton accordingly demanded compensation, which was refused. The affidavits in answer stated that the colliery had for several years been liable to occasional stoppages from water flowing into the works; that when the new course of the brook was first set out, upon the suggestion of Gratton, instructions were given to make the bottom of the new course of the same depth as the adit of the colliery, so as to permit the same to drain freely into the brook; and that after the new course was completed, the water from the colliery had been constantly seen draining into it through the adit; and that afterwards there was a heavy flood, which washed a quantity of earth down the new course, and partially obstructed the mouth of the adit; and that such soil still remained, it not being considered necessary to clear the same away, as the colliery had ceased to be worked for a period of three months before that time. It was denied that the company had caused the water to flow from such stream into the adit in larger quantities than it had always done. Sect. 12 empowered the company to alter the course of any rivers, &c., as might be necessary for constructing tunnels, &c., and to divert or alter the course of any rivers or streams,

Lord Denman, C. J., said:—

“We do not adjudge that there is damage done; that is a question for the jury: it is enough to induce us to issue a mandamus, that the claimants say, by the raising of the level of the brook, that being part of the word ‘diverting,’ they have suffered.”

And Littledale, J., added:—

“They cannot recover by action for the lawful acts; they must have a mandamus for that. If part of the injury has been done under the powers of a statute, they cannot have their remedy for it by action at law.”

But where the injury caused to the plaintiff is such as, if there were no statute authorizing the doing the act causing the injury, would not give the plaintiff a cause of action against the party doing such act, in such cases of course the plaintiff has no claim to compensation. In a case (y), therefore, where a waterworks company, in the execution of works authorized by their special act (which incorporated the Waterworks Clauses Act, which contains the usual compensation clauses), intercepted water which would otherwise have percolated through the earth into a well, and drained off water which had accumulated in the well, it was held that, inasmuch as no action would have lain against the company in respect of either quantity of water (z), supposing no act authorizing the execution of the works had passed, the owner of the well was not entitled to compensation. And Cockburn, C. J., said:—

compensation unless his injury exceed that to the rest of the public. This was decided in R. v. Bristol Dock Co. (b), which was an application for a mandamus to defendants to assess compensation to the applicants for injury sustained in consequence of the dock works. The applicants were brewers, holding a brewhouse at Bristol for a long term of years. At the time of passing the Dock Act, 43 Geo. 3, these premises were supplied with water fit for brewing from the Avon, which water was brought by pipes communicating with the river at low water mark, at which time it was pumped into the brewery; but by means of the works authorized by the acts of Parliament, the water at the point of communication with the pipes became brackish, by reason of which the applicants were obliged to abandon their premises; and they having applied, without effect, to the defendants to grant compensation, they now made this application. The Court asked whether, if any person before the act passed had done anything to deteriorate the water of the river, these parties could have brought an action as for a private injury to their property. Scarlett argued that they might, and that there were instances where persons, having acquired the right to use the water of rivers for their own purposes, had maintained actions against those who disturbed them in the enjoyment. But by Lord Ellenborough, C. J. :—

“Those were cases where the owners of the property by long enjoyment had acquired special rights to the use of the water in its natural state, as it was accustomed to flow, by way of particular easement to their own properties, and not merely a use which was common to all the king’s subjects. But here the injury, if any, is to all the king’s subjects; and that is the subject-matter of indictment and not of action; if the salubrity of the air were impaired in consequence of the docks, every inhabitant of the place might as well claim a compensation. For general injuries, common to all the subjects, the remedy is by indictment; but that, I suppose, is taken away by the act (which was admitted): then the act has taken away the only remedy which the law would have given for this general injury.”

Le Blanc, J. :—

“These persons have no more claim to compensation than every inhabitant would have who had been used to dip a pail into the river for water for the use of his horse.”

ing the chief access to his residence, although he was liable to constant stoppages by the closing of the gates on the level crossing, and the passing of trains frightened his horses, and terrified his visitors, particularly ladies; it was held, that these annoyances did not ground a claim of damages against the railway company, the inconvenience felt in such a case being one to which all the Queen's subjects are exposed, and for which no particular or individual remedy exists. It was also held, that it is a mistake to regard the proximity of a level crossing as injurious to an estate or residence, within the meaning of railway legislation. In giving judgment, Lord Cranworth, L. C., said:—

“The merits of this case involve a question of considerable importance, namely, whether a proprietor, who holds land adjoining a newly-constructed railway, can, under the clauses of the general act and the special acts which give him a right of compensation in respect of any injurious effect upon his lands, claim from the company compensation because at a short distance from the entrance to his grounds the railway traverses an important public road upon a level.

“The map which both parties here have referred to, and which we may take, therefore, as accurately representing the state of the ground, shows that at a short distance (whether of forty-nine yards or fifty-nine yards is immaterial) from his gate, the railway does traverse upon a level a public road, which, though not the only approach, is yet the most common and the best approach to his house. He claimed compensation, and the sheriff's jury returned a verdict for 300*l.* in respect of land and freestone, and for 560*l.* in respect of severance and level crossing, but without distinguishing how much had been assessed for the severance and how much for the level crossing. The question is, whether it was competent to the sheriff to give any redress in respect of this level crossing. And, my lords, I am of opinion, that no compensation can be claimed or legitimately given on this head of complaint.

“These acts of Parliament are, as is unfortunately too often the case, loosely worded; but the construction that is put upon this expression ‘injuriously affected,’ in the clauses in the act of Parliament which gives compensation for injuriously affecting lands, certainly does not entitle the owner of lands, which he alleges to be injuriously affected, to any compensation in respect of any act which, if done by the railway company without the authority of Parliament, would not have entitled him to bring an action against them. I purposely guard myself by putting it in that way, because I am far from admitting that he would have a right of compensation in some cases in which, if the act of Parliament had not passed, there might have been not only an indictment, but a right of action. And the necessity of so guarding myself is made apparent by the case of Greashy v. Codling (d), which, if the law be applicable to a railway, would certainly entitle everybody, who is stopped for a minute whilst the gates are shut, to an action for damages, because it would be said, under the authority of that case, which I think is a very correct decision, that where an act is done, such as shutting gates across a public road without the authority of Parliament, that gives the parties a right of action. If, therefore, the act of Parliament did not mean to exclude the right of compensation in some cases in which, if the act had not passed, there would have been redress, every person who is stopped for a moment, while the gates of a railway are shut at a level crossing, would be entitled to an action.

"But I apprehend it is clear that in these acts of Parliament, the legislature means to authorize these public companies, for the convenience and advantage of the public, to do acts with regard to which they are not only relieved in respect of what they are doing from indictments at the instance of the public, or speaking more properly at the instance of the crown, but they are also entitled to do them without being liable to redress at the suit of individuals. That cannot be better illustrated than by the case which has been put by Mr. Anderson, that they are authorized to have a railway upon a crossing, having gates to prevent persons passing along the road at times when it would be dangerous, by reason of trains being near at hand. That necessarily, therefore, occasions a stoppage to persons, which, if there were not an act of Parliament, would entitle them to bring an action against the railway company. It is clear that the legislature meant to exclude any right of action in such a case as that.

Compensation.
Caledonian R. Co.
v. Ogilvy.

"Now, my lords, that being the case, suppose that without any act of Parliament having been passed for making this railway, certain speculators had taken upon themselves to make a railway across a public road, and had erected gates, certainly the owner of the estate might, with respect to any detention occasioned to him by the closing of those gates, bring an action against the makers of the railway; and as he might do this toties quoties, he would probably have more frequent rights of action than other subjects of her Majesty. But it would only be a more frequent repetition of the same damage; it would not be any damage different from that which might be sustained by any other subjects of her Majesty; for all attempts at arguing that this is a damage to the estate is a mere play upon words. It is no damage at all to the estate, except that the owner of that estate would oftener have a right of action from time to time than any other person, inasmuch as he would traverse the spot oftener than other people would traverse it.

"It appears to me, therefore, clear by the acts of Parliament and by the intention of the legislature, that there is no right of compensation whatever, for, except for any actual detention, no right of action would have existed, if the making of the railway had not been authorized by Parliament, and the detention caused by the necessary closing of the gates is certainly made lawful by the act.

"My lords, I consider this to be not only clear upon principle, but clear also upon the authority of the cases relating to this subject. The cases enunciating this principle are not indeed very numerous, and for this reason, I take it, that in the Courts of England it has been assumed that the principle is perfectly clear. It was so assumed in the case of South Staffordshire R. Co. v. Hall (e). It is also adverted to by Lord Truro in Gatthe's case (f). The same principle was also expressly referred to by Lord Cottenham, in L. & N. W. R. Co. v. Smith (g), and the circumstance that, in many of those cases, the judges have expressed an opinion that there would probably be a right of compensation, not only affords no argument in favour of the respondents, but is an argument against them, because the grounds upon which the right of compensation in those cases have been put are grounds which in this case do not exist. In the case of South Staffordshire R. Co. v. Hall, there was a railway traversing a private road between a public road and a house, interfering with the easement which was possessed by the owner of that property. Gatthe's case, I think, was something of the same sort. Then there was the case of R. v. Eastern Counties R. Co. (h), where compensation was held to be legitimately claimable. That was a case in which the owner of the land having his land adjoining what was before the passing of the act for making the railway a public road, with a gate that let him out into the public road, was, by the making of the railway, deprived of that road, and his gate was a gate up in the air so to speak. It was of no use to him, and therefore he was materially damaged. These were all cases of special and peculiar injury. It was the same in a case which was before me, and I think Lord Truro also, of a tunnel that was being made close adjoining a public-house, where deposits of wine and beer were kept. The proprietors of the house were damaged by the making of this tunnel (i). That was a personal and private injury to the land, and consequently to the owner of the land.

"Upon the merits of this case, therefore, I confess that I entertain no doubts whatever."

Chamberlain v.
West End and

R. Co.

But if any one individual sustains private and particular damage beyond that sustained by the rest of the public, in respect of that damage he is entitled to compensation. This was in effect decided in the cases we have already considered, of altering public roads (k); but the principle was more emphatically laid down in the Exchequer Chamber, in affirming the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, in Chamberlain v. West End of London and Crystal Palace R. Co. (l). In that case, the plaintiff was the lessee of some houses situate on a high road, and the defendants, being authorized by their act to do so, made an obstruction and deviation of the road, by which that part of it running by the plaintiff's houses was no longer used as a high road, and the number of persons passing by the houses was greatly diminished, so that the houses were rendered less valuable as shops. And it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to compensation.

Rule does not apply where injury results to lands from acts done by company on a portion taken by the company.

Re Stockport,

The before-mentioned principle, that compensation cannot be claimed unless the damage result from an act done under the act of Parliament, and an action at law would have lain but for the act, does not, however, apply where compensation is sought for an injury to one portion of the claimant's lands arising from acts done by the company on another portion of the claimant's lands which has been taken by the company. Where, therefore, a cotton mill belonging to the claimant, situate near land taken from him by the company, became exposed to fire from engines passing along the railway on the land so taken, and could only be insured at an increased rate; it was held by the Court of Queen's Bench that the claimant was entitled to compensation in respect of the liability to pay such increased rate of insurance (m). And, in giving judgment, Crompton, J., said:—

"On the part of the company it was not denied that the premises were rendered less convenient and fit for the purposes of a cotton-mill, and that the saleable value of the mill was diminished by reason of what had been done by virtue of the provisions of the act. But it was asserted that no action would have lain against any proprietor for damage from fire arising from the proximity of works or engines carried on and managed without negligence, and therefore that the case fell within the well-established rule, that compensation is only given by such acts of Parliament when what would have been unlawful and actionable but for an act of Parliament is permitted by the act of Parliament, and compensation therefore allowed in lieu and by reason of such right of action being taken away. I adhere entirely to the rule as laid down by my Brother Willes, in Broadbent v. Imperial Gas Co. (n), and in many other cases. But the question here is whether such rule is at all applicable to cases where part of the land is taken and compensation is given not only for the value of the part taken but for the rest of the land being injuriously affected either by severance or otherwise, and I am of opinion that the distinction pointed out by Mr. Manisty is correct, and that the rule in question does not apply to such cases. Where the damage is occasioned by what is done upon other land which the company have purchased, and such damage would not have been actionable as against the original proprietor, as in the case of the sinking of a well, and causing the abstraction of water by percolation, the company have a right to say, We have done what we had a right to do as proprietors, and do not require the protection of any act of Parliament, we, therefore, have not injured you by virtue of the provisions of the act; no cause of action has been taken away from you by the act. Where, however, the mischief is caused by what is done on the land taken, the party seeking compensation has a right to say it is by the act of Parliament and the act of Parliament only that you have done the acts which have caused the damage; without the act of Parliament everything you have done and are about to do in the making and using the railway would have been illegal and actionable,—and is therefore matter for compensation according to the rule in question.

Re Stockport,

“I think, therefore, that the distinction between cases where the land is taken and the cases of obstruction of light, rights of way, &c., by acts done on other land is well founded. This distinction is referred to by my Brother Blackburn in the recent case of Chamberlain v. Crystal Palace R. Co. (o), as having been taken in former cases.

“I am of opinion that the premises in question were injuriously affected within the section of the Lands Clauses Act as to compensation where land is taken, and that the jury have rightly included the damages for such injury in their verdict, and consequently that this rule for a certiorari should be discharged with costs.”

And a jury have no right to assess prospective or future damages, since the extent of damage cannot be ascertained till after the damage has been actually inflicted. This was decided in the following case (p), sent by Lord Lyndhurst, C., to the Court of Exchequer:—The plaintiffs, the Lake Loch Railroad Company, had completed a railway upon the river Calder extending about three miles, towards certain collieries, and on which considerable traffic was carried on. The Aire and Calder Navigation Company, of which defendants were trustees, were empowered by several acts of Parliament to improve the navigation of the Calder. By the 9 Geo. 4, c. xcvi, they were empowered to make new cuts, and also a railway, to extend from one of the said intended new cuts at Stanley Ferry, to communicate with a turnpike road leading from Leeds. The statute authorized the navigation company to enter upon the lands of any person, making satisfaction, in manner thereafter mentioned, to the owners, &c.

By the 20th section, if the parties could not agree as to the compensation, a jury should be summoned, "and such jury shall inquire of, assess and ascertain the sum of money to be paid for the purchase of such lands, &c., and also what other separate and distinct sum of money shall be paid by way of recompense, either for the damages which shall or may before that time have been sustained as aforesaid, or for the future temporary or perpetual continuance of any recurring damages which shall have been so occasioned as aforesaid, and the cause or occasion of which shall have been only in part obviated or repaired by the said undertakers, and which can or will be no further obviated, repaired or remedied by them." By sect. 27 it was enacted, "that the juries shall award all determinations which they shall give, concerning the value of lands, separately and distinctly from any damages sustained or to be sustained as aforesaid, and shall distinguish the value set upon lands, and the money assessed or adjudged for such damages as aforesaid, separately and apart from each other."

By sect. 110, if the undertakers should not within five years agree for, or cause to be valued and paid for, the lands, &c., then and from thenceforth such powers were to cease. By sect. 111, if the intended works should not be completed, so that boats and carriages might pass along the whole line, within fifteen years, then, after the expiration of the said term of fifteen years, all the powers were to cease, save only in respect of so much (if any) of the works thereby authorized as should have been completed and made navigable and passable within the said fifteen years. The statute also enabled the company to pay money into the Bank, if the owner of any land refused to accept the same for compensation. The case stated that the projected railway, extending from Stanley Ferry to the turnpike road, had been staked out, but no part laid down; that the company had paid for the whole of the land, except the piece now in question, which formed a portion of the Lake Loch Railway. (The case then set out the notice given by the undertakers to the Lake Loch Company, of their readiness to treat for the sale of the piece of land, and the other notices preliminary to the summoning of a jury to assess the value.)

In pursuance of such last-mentioned notice an inquiry was held at the sessions, and upon that inquiry the jury gave their verdict as follows, viz.—

Eight perches of land, value	£6
Present damages	0
Future damages	£2,800

The undertakers objected to that part of the finding whereby the jury assessed the sum of 2,800*l.* for future damages; nevertheless the justices pronounced their judgment according to the finding. The undertakers paid the sum of 6*l.* into the Bank, whereupon the company obtained an injunction to restrain the undertakers from entering upon the land. One of the questions now submitted was, whether defendants could take the piece of land without paying the sum of 2,800*l.* (q).

Lord Abinger, C. B., said:—

“The verdict in respect of these contingent and imaginary damages, which may never occur at all, is a mere nullity. The true construction of the act is, that the ‘recurring damages’ must be taken to mean ejusdem generis with those which have already arisen; it being open to a party, when a new description of damage ensues, to have a new remedy, either by action or, if the act justifies it, by a jury. In the latter case, if, when the company commenced their operations (the land having previously been valued and paid for), their tramroad shall be found to do damage to the adjoining lands of the Lake Loch Company, or in the making of it they shall obstruct the passage on the Lake Loch road, or continually obstruct the cross roads, so as to prevent the traffic upon them, then the parties so damaged may apply for compensation under that particular head, and obtain it. But in this case the jury have found no damage yet sustained; how then can they find a verdict for contingent damages, which may never occur at all? As, for example, what would be the case if the company were not to make the tramroad, but having taken and paid for the land, were to leave it in its present condition for ever?”

Lord Wensleydale said:—

“It seems to me that the jury have no right to assess prospective damages, except after (if I may so say) an example of damage has already occurred; that is in accordance with the language of the section, and I think it would be impossible for the jury fairly to perform their duty without having such an example to go by. The undertakers have a right either to treat with the parties interested in the lands, or to go before a jury. Then the provision respecting the jury is this: that ‘they shall inquire of, assess and ascertain the sum or sums of money to be paid for the purchase of such lands, grounds, &c.; and also what other separate and distinct sum or sums of money shall be paid by way of recompense, either for the damages which shall or may before that time have been sustained as aforesaid,’ i. e. which shall or may before that time have been sustained by the execution of any of the powers thereby granted—that is, something that is actually done, something that is completed; but not only for that but also ‘for the future temporary or perpetual continuance of any recurring damage which shall have been so occasioned as aforesaid ;' i. e. the cause of which shall exist in the execution of the powers of the act. The cause of the damage must, therefore, have existed in something more or less done or completed by the company. And there is a further limitation to cases where the cause or occasion shall have been only in part obviated or repaired by the undertakers, for that must be the fair reading of the clause, and 'which can or will be no further obviated, remedied or repaired by them.' The cause of injury, therefore, must exist in some work of the company which is already then done ; and that work must be in such a state as to be incapable of further alteration, so as to obviate the damage. That being the case, and there being a permanent subsisting cause, and the work being incapable of beneficial alteration, so as to prevent mischief to others, then, and then only, have the jury the power of computing the future damage. That is fair and reasonable ; there is a permanent cause ; they know how often the injury may accrue, and what it is at present ; and from these data they have the power of making a contingent assessment of damages. I would put, as an example, the case of leakage through the bank of the canal, or the interruption of some watercourse, the effect of which you can collect from a bygone time, so as to afford some proper estimate with regard to future time. And it is in that case only, as it seems to me, that there is power to assess future damages. Whenever the Lake Loch Company do receive any actual injury from the works of the undertakers, by the interruption of their trains from moving along the road, and so often as they receive any injury, they will have a right to call upon a jury to make compensation to them."

Penny v. South-Eastern R. Co.
Injury to amenities.

Nor is a landowner entitled to compensation for every kind of disturbance or inconvenience caused by the construction of a railway, though the value of his habitation be deteriorated, the comfort diminished, and the amenity destroyed ; nor, would it seem, for injury to a house from the concussion and vibration caused by the running of trains on the line after completion (r). In a case (s), therefore, in which a sheriff's jury had granted, in one lump sum, compensation to the owner of a house, upon a claim in respect of the constant noise and shaking, and annoyance by day and night, caused by the passage of trains, and from the circumstance of the back windows and garden being overlooked by persons on the railway platform, and the privacy thereby invaded, the Court of Queen's Bench granted a certiorari to remove, for the purpose of quashing, the inquisition ; Lord Campbell saying :—

"The test is, whether, before the railway act passed, authorizing the company to do what has been done here, an action would have lain at common law for what has been done and for which compensation has been claimed. If it would, and that act is authorized by the railway act, compensation may be claimed in respect of it : if the land is not taken and nothing is done which would have afforded a cause of action before the act passed, then, although it may produce a deterioration of the property, it does not injuriously affect the land and constitute a ground for compensation. The undersheriff told the jury that they ought to give compensation for the claimant's ground being overlooked and his privacy being disturbed: for that an action would not have lain. Compensation might just as well be claimed if a mound had been constructed half a mile off, and it cut off the view of a fine wood or a church."

Compensation.
Penny v. South-
Eastern R. Co.

And if a landowner has not actually sustained damage, and there is no reason to apprehend that he will sustain damage, notwithstanding his being nearer to the possible cause of injury than the rest of the public, he has no peculiar position or claim to entitle him to become the redresser of a public grievance, or to complain of the disregard of the provisions of an act of Parliament. Proceedings in such a case must be taken on the part of the public by indictment, or in equity by information by the Attorney-General. In a case (t), therefore, which has already been referred to, in which a canal company having power by act of Parliament to raise an embankment to a certain height, exceeded that height, and the plaintiff, fearing that his lands might thereby be flooded, filed a bill for an injunction, his bill was dismissed; the Lord Chancellor saying:—

cient.

Ware v. Regent's
Canal Co.

"The language of Lord Eldon in Blakemore v. Glamorganshire Canal Co. (u) certainly appears to sustain the proposition of the plaintiff to its fullest extent, but I adopt the interpretation of that language by Baron Alderson, in Lee v. Milner (x), and with him I say that these acts 'ought to be treated as conditional powers given by Parliament, to take the lands of the different proprietors, through whose estates the works are to proceed. Each landowner, therefore, has a right to have the powers strictly and literally carried into effect as regards his own land, and also to require that no variation shall be made to his prejudice, in the carrying into effect the bargain between the undertakers and any one else.' The words 'to his prejudice' may mean not only to his possible but actual prejudice, and Lord Eldon himself seems to have qualified and explained the generality of his own language, by one of the issues in Blakemore v. Glamorganshire Canal Co."

And where there is an original equity affecting the claim to compensation, as where the landowner has entered into an agreement as to the compensation he is entitled to, a Court of Equity would interfere to stay by injunction proceedings to obtain compensation under the Lands Clauses Act. This appears from the following case (y):— Damages were claimed for injuries done to a brewery, by the erection of a new market, under an act of Parliament which incorporated the Lands Clauses Act. The damages claimed were—first, for narrowing a street bounding the brewery; secondly, for temporary obstruction of the thoroughfare; and thirdly, for obstruction of the access of light and air, and contracted ventilation. This last damage did not appear to have been complained of or discovered until the new market buildings had arisen to a considerable height. The defendant, the owner of the brewery, gave one notice, embracing all the three heads of complaint, to proceed by arbitration, according to sections 25 and 68 of the Lands Clauses Act. There had been a treaty for compensation for the two former heads of damage, but it did not appear to have been completed and carried into effect. There had been no treaty for compensation as to the third ground of complaint. Under these circumstances, Sir G. Turner, V. C., granted an injunction to prevent the defendant from proceeding under the notice he had given. His Honor said:—

“I am of opinion that there is a sufficient cause for the injunction. The questions which were raised as to the frame of the pleadings and the jurisdiction of the Court were, that the bill alleged that the defendant had received compensation for the injury occasioned by the street having been obstructed and narrowed, and that this allegation brought the case directly within the principle of Gatthe's case (z). But although this bill is not in this respect so aptly framed as it might have been, I think, upon the whole, the fair meaning of it is, not that the agreement has been completed and carried out, and the satisfaction perfected; but that the defendant has received consideration for an agreement which he refuses to perfect; thus opening the case for specific performance. And although the bill does not pray that relief, I think the facts are sufficiently stated for a decree to be founded upon them; and the case being thus opened upon the pleadings, I am of opinion that Gatthe's case does not affect the present question. That case has overruled L. and N. W. R. Co. v. Smith (a), and has settled, on most satisfactory grounds, that this Court ought not to interfere by injunction to restrain parties, who insist that their property has been injuriously affected within the meaning of the 68th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, from prosecuting their claims according to the provisions of the act, upon the mere ground that the act has not provided the means of determining the preliminary question, whether the property has been injuriously affected or not; but it has settled no more. Whether the same rule would apply to a case in which there are several grounds of claim, some of which have been satisfied, remains yet to be determined; and not having had the benefit of a full argument upon that point, I shall not determine it. At all events, the case does not touch the question of the interference of this Court, where there is an original equity affecting the claim. The case decides that where there is no original equity affecting the claim, the statute does not create such an equity; but where there is such an original equity affecting the claim, the statute does not, in my opinion, take it away. Being of opinion that the plaintiff in this case has sufficient grounds for contending that some at least of the claims of the defendant are affected by contract, entered into before the claims were advanced, this injunction must be granted. It was urged by the defendant that it ought to be so limited as to extend only to the claim for obstructing and narrowing the street; but having regard to the provisions of the act, as to costs, I think it cannot be so limited. The defendant, if he thinks it right to prosecute the claim as to obstruction of light and air, before the equity of the present bill is determined, must give a fresh notice for the purpose.”

And where acts done by the company are not necessary for the construction of their works, it may be that persons damaged thereby are not entitled to compensation. Where, therefore, the Hungerford Market Company pulled down a house which they purchased; and in doing so, ascertained that the party-wall of the adjoining house was of an insufficient thickness, whereupon the company took proceedings under the Metropolitan Building Act, and the wall was rebuilt; it was held, that the occupier of the adjoining house was not entitled to receive compensation for damages sustained by loss of trade, &c., whilst the wall was rebuilding (b), Lord Denman, C. J., saying:—

Compensation.

R. v. Hungerford Market Co.

No compensation for works not within Act of Parliament.

“The company have only exercised an ordinary right: finding that a house, adjoining one which they had purchased, had an insufficient party-wall, they, as any purchaser might have done, enforced the provisions of the Building Act. It is true that the pulling down of the house was an act done in pursuance of the statute; so was every act, even to the minutest, done by the company in the course of these works; but it would be going very far to say that on that account the 68th section [the compensation clause] applied to everything that was so done. The only question here is, whether the particular act from which the damage immediately proceeded was in pursuance of the statute. I think it was not, but that the company merely exercised the right which belonged to any purchaser.”

So where the same company purchased a house, No. 11, and pulled it down, and thereby caused damage and inconvenience to the occupier of No. 12, it was held, that the occupier of No. 12 was not entitled to receive any compensation, (in the absence of negligence,) it appearing that No. 11 was purchased by the company under an agreement made with the owner; and neither No. 11 nor No. 12 being mentioned in the schedule annexed to the company's act (c).

Where damage arises from the construction of works not authorized, or from the negligent construction of works which are authorized, or from exceeding the powers given by the special or general acts of Parliament, in such cases the parties injured are left to their common law rights, and may maintain actions against the company, provided of course that the injury is such as would support an action against an individual. “The distinction is now clearly established between damage from works authorized by statute (where the party generally is to have compensation, and the authority is a bar to an action), and damage by reason of the work being negligently done, as to which the owner's remedy by action remains” (d).

held to be no departure for the plaintiff to reply negligence. It has been held that a railway company dwell within the meaning of the County Court Act, where they carry on their general business, and not at every station, and therefore the L. and N. W. R. Co. cannot be said to dwell at Chester, but in London. Brown v. L. and N. W. R. Co., 4 Best & S. 326.

Compensation.
Turner v. Sheffield and Rotherham R. Co.

Upon this principle, in a case (e) in which a railway act contained the usual clauses as to compensation, and also a proviso that nothing therein contained should authorize the company to take or injure any house not specified in the schedule; it was held, that an action could be maintained against the company to recover damage caused to a house not specified in the schedule, in consequence of dust and obstruction of light arising from the erection of a railway station and embankment at a place adjoining to the house. In giving judgment, Lord Wensleydale said:—

“The plaintiff is entitled to judgment. The question turns on the 20th section of the act (f): adopting the ordinary grammatical construction of the clause, the company could neither take the house in question, nor do any act by which it should be injured; and such construction certainly ought to prevail, unless it leads to an absurdity, or be manifestly repugnant to the intention of the legislature, as collected from the context, in which case the language may be modified, so as to obviate such absurdity, or cure such repugnance. The argument, which brought before us all the material clauses of the act, and pointed out some inconveniences arising from construing the proviso according to the ordinary sense of its words, has failed to convince us that this construction is repugnant to the rest of the act, or that any absurdity would follow if it were adopted. There is no doubt some inconvenience to the company in their being exposed to actions for unforeseen consequential damages, arising from their acts to houses, &c. not comprised within the schedule. On that point, however, we pronounce no judgment. But in such a case as this, in which the damage could have been foreseen when the station and embankment were made, we see no reason to qualify the words of the clause, and, consequently, the company are liable to this action.”

Similar principles were acted upon in the following case, where lands were injured by flood waters penned back by a railway embankment (g).

Lawrence v. Great Northern R. Co.

The plaintiff was lessee of certain lands under C., and brought this action for an injury to his land, by its being flooded, as he alleged, by the fault of the defendants in constructing their railway across the lands of other persons, without leaving sufficient openings for the passage of flood waters, whereby they were obstructed and penned up, and forced upon the lands of the plaintiff. The defendants pleaded that, before the plaintiff had anything in the lands now in his occupation, they gave notice to C. to purchase certain lands of his, adjoining to those now of the plaintiff; that it was referred to an arbitrator to fix the amount of the purchase-money, and of com-compensation for injury to the lands and other estates of C., by severance or otherwise, and to determine what bridges, arches, culverts, &c. should be made; that he awarded 7,990*l.*, and directed what should be constructed; that the money was paid, and the works directed were done. A verdict having been found for the plaintiff: upon an application to the Court of Queen's Bench to enter a verdict for the defendants, on the ground that the action was not, under the circumstances, maintainable, Patteson, J., said:—

Compensation.
Lawrence v.
Great Northern
R. Co.

"The main point in the case is, whether the compensation referred to in the pleadings relates only to all damage known or contingent, by reason of the construction of the railway on the lands purchased of C., and to other damage arising from the construction of the railway at other places, which was apparent and capable of being ascertained and estimated at the time when the compensation was awarded; or whether it embraces also all contingent and possible damages which might arise afterwards, by the works of the company at other places, and which could neither be foreseen nor even guessed at by the arbitrator. The proposition that it was to be taken to embrace such damages is so startling, that we should expect some express provision to be pointed out to that effect, either in the general acts relating to railways, or the special act under which this railway was constructed, or the instrument of reference. We have examined all these, and are not only unable to find any such express provision, but any clause whatever which can fairly have any such interpretation put upon it. We are therefore clearly of opinion that the compensation must be taken in the restricted sense contended for by the plaintiff.

"But it is contended by the defendants, that they have constructed their railway according to the provisions of their special act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. lxxi, and are not liable for any consequences which may follow to the damage of the plaintiff. The railway passes across the low lands adjoining the river Dun, over which the flood waters of that river used to spread themselves. These low lands were separated from the plaintiff's land by a bank, constructed under certain drainage acts, and which protected the plaintiff's land from floods. By the construction of the defendant's railway without sufficient openings, those flood waters could not spread themselves as formerly, and were penned up and flowed over the bank on the plaintiff's land. Prima facie this would give the plaintiff a cause of action; and the question is, whether the company are protected by their act. Now, the 162nd section obliges them to make openings when the railway crosses any public drains, embankments or works made in any drainage district, but it is silent as to flood waters.

The 163rd section, indeed, obliges them to make openings for flood waters in another district in another county, and it is relied on by the defendants, on the principle 'expressio unius est exclusio alterius;' and certainly, so far as any remedy by mandamus or otherwise, to compel them to make openings for flood waters in the Dun district, might be attempted to be enforced, the act would not warrant it. The company may have been at liberty under the act to construct their railway across the low lands in the manner they have done; but it does not follow that, in case an unforeseen injury arises to any one from the mode in which it is constructed, they are not liable to an action.

"It was, indeed, held in R. v. Pease (h), that where an act of Parliament authorized the making of a railway parallel and near to a highway, the company were not answerable for injuries sustained in consequence of horses passing along the highway being frightened; but there the proximity to the highway being expressly authorized by the act, and the railway being used in the proper and ordinary manner, it was impossible to hold the company responsible, without in effect repealing the act of Parliament. Here the company might, by executing their works with proper caution, have avoided the injury which the plaintiff has sustained; and we think that the want of such caution is sufficient to sustain the action. The rule to enter a verdict for the defendants must be discharged."

Broadbent v. Imperial Gas Co.
Injunction
granted.

Upon similar principles, in a case (i) in which a gas company made gas so as to cause a nuisance to a market-gardener, although they were authorized by their special act to make gas, yet, as the Gas Companies Clauses Act, which was incorporated in their act, contains an express proviso that nothing in the private act contained shall authorize the company to make or supply gas in any way so as to cause a nuisance by it, and an arbitrator to whom an action brought had been referred had found that the gas was a nuisance; Lord Cranworth, L. C., granted a perpetual injunction, to prevent the company working in such a manner as to be injurious to the plaintiff; and his decision was upheld in the House of Lords.

Bagnall v. London and North-Western R. Co.

The following case (k) also was decided on similar principles. The facts sufficiently appear in the judgment, delivered by Bramwell, B.:

"The material facts of this case are as follows. The plaintiffs are owners and occupiers of a coal mine: the surface soil as well as the coal below formerly belonged to the same owner, but a railway company (to whose rights and obligations the defendants have succeeded) took the surface, under the powers of a special act of Parliament, for their railway, and constructed it thereon. The railway company (by which may be understood indifferently the original company or the defendants) cut and removed upwards of twenty feet in thickness of the surface over where the plaintiffs' mine now is, to get the level at which they laid their rails: this surface soil was clay impervious to water; by removing it a porous rock was reached; the soil was in like manner cut away by the railway company along the length of the line to a district of country through which a brook flowed: here the railway was on or above the natural level of the ground; it was carried over the brook by a flat bridge; the line of railway sloped downwards from the bridge to a part over the plaintiffs' mine; the bridge was sufficient to let the ordinary water of the brook pass, and even more, but was found an impediment to the passage of more in large floods; the railway company was bound to make and maintain drains, the obligation being the same as in the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. A flood happened in 1860, and the result of the combined acts of the company was, that water, part of which would have escaped but for the bridge, flowed down the railway, and the high ground between the brook and the surface over the mine being removed, it reached that spot, and the high ground and protection of clay then being gone, and the drains being imperfect as after mentioned, it permeated into the mine; so also did the water falling on the spot itself and the springs arising in the cutting. But it here becomes necessary to mention, that when the railway was making, the mines were not worked under nor within forty yards of the railway; the railway was made with drains at the side, sufficient to carry off the water which fell or came there without doing any mischief as matters then stood; when the plaintiffs' workings came to forty yards from the railway, they gave the defendants notice under the local act, which may be treated as substantially the same in its provisions as the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act. The defendants, however, did not purchase the mines. The plaintiffs accordingly worked on, and when their workings came under the railway, from no fault or negligence of theirs, but as a natural consequence of fair and lawful working, the railway sank and continued to do so from time to time. The defendants repaired this by throwing material of a porous character on the sunken parts; they did not, however, repair and puddle the drains, which from the sinking of the soil became inefficient, and even had they been efficient, they would not have carried off the flood water of August, 1860. For the damage sustained from the water thus getting into the mines, this action was brought. It seems to us impossible to state these facts, without showing that the plaintiffs have a claim on the defendants of some kind. Without any fault of theirs the natural condition of things had been altered. The water of the brook, which flowed at a distance of one-third of a mile from their mine, inaccessible to it by being separated from it by ground twenty-five feet high, has been diverted over it; its natural covering and upper soil having been removed from it. From the last-mentioned circumstance, and the want of efficient drains, the rain which fell upon it and the springs which rise in the cuttings have got into it. These are the acts of the railway company alone. It is said that the plaintiffs have brought about the mischief by working their mines, but they have a right to work them as they did. They lose no right by doing so. It could not be contended, that had the defendants thought fit to agree to purchase, they could have done so at a nominal price, on the plea that if the plaintiffs worked them they would be worthless, as they would be drowned. We do not say that the defendants were bound to restore the surface; they might have diverted their line and left hollows over the spot in question, but they were bound by their act to make and maintain effectual drains. This reasoning applies to water other than at the time of the flood. As to that, the plaintiffs' case is still clearer. Suppose, instead of the defendants' railway passing through a cutting and over a brook, it had been a branch railway belonging to a private proprietor and joining the defendants' railway just before reaching the plaintiffs' mine, would not such a private proprietor have been clearly liable to this action? and if so, why are not the defendants? As to the flood-water, they are not sued merely as a railway company who have taken the surface of the plaintiffs' land, but as persons who, by their acts on lands at a distance, have done this injury; and it seems to us they would be liable for the damage by flood-water, if the plaintiffs had continued owners of the surface, and for some reason had thought fit to remove it to the depth the railway company has here, for it would still be the acts of the defendants that sent the water there. But it was suggested, that if the plaintiffs had a claim, it was to be enforced under the compensation clauses. We think not. The plaintiffs are not injuriously affected by the works of the railway company. Supposing the company had possessed no statutory powers, they could not have been restrained by injunction from executing any of those works, nor could any action have been maintained against them simply for their construction. The railway company would have been entitled to say these are not injuries, and never will be. By means of puddling the surface and drainage, no water will ever reach you, nor need it as appears. It is not, therefore, the works intrinsically which injuriously affect the plaintiffs, but the defendants' wrong conduct in relation to them in not making and maintaining outlets for the flood-water or damming it off the plaintiffs' land, or covering the surface thereof with clay, and in not maintaining those drains which were efficient to carry off the rain which fell, and the spring water which arose there. Our judgment, therefore, is for the plaintiffs in respect of both of these claims."

2. Compensation on Claims made by Lessees of Lands.

The right of tenants or lessees of lands, &c., to compensation for damage or injury to the lands in their occupation by the construction of railways (l), depends on the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act (m), and the sixth and sixteenth sections of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act (n). The mode of assessing and recovering compensation is pointed out by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act.

The sections in that act specially applicable to lands subject to leases are sects. 119, 120, 121 and 122 (o).

The terms of sect. 68 (p) are indeed very general, and if that section stood alone it would include every case in which compensation could be claimed, including the case of a tenant at will or from year to year. But the application of it is restricted by the subsequent clauses, which make express provision for certain cases, and in those cases the mode of proceeding must be that which is pointed out by the section specially applicable. Where, therefore, a person has no greater interest in premises actually required by the company than as tenant for a year or from year to year, he is (in the absence of any agreement to refer the matter to arbitration which would be binding (q)) confined to the remedy given by sect. 121, viz., the determination of two justices, and is not entitled to have his claim settled by arbitration under sect. 68 (r). But the case of a tenant from year to year, the possession of whose property is not wholly or partially required to be given up, but is merely injuriously affected by the execution of the works of a railway, is within the large words of the 68th section, and not within the restrictive words of the 121st section (s). Such a person may therefore proceed to assess the compensation to which he is entitled under sect. 68.

In cases, however, within the limits of the Metropolitan Railway Act it is, to meet this difficulty, specially provided (t) that—

“All claims for compensation made upon the company under the provisions of the acts relating to the Metropolitan Railway, or any of them, or any act incorporated therewith, shall, if the person claiming to be entitled to compensation has no greater interest than as tenant for a year or from year to year, in the lands in respect of which the compensation is claimed, be determined in manner provided by the 121st section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.”

Cases within limits of metropolitan railway acts.

There are similar provisions in the acts passed in 1864 (u), relating to the Metropolitan, the North London, and the Great Eastern Railways.

There are very few reported cases upon the construction of the above-mentioned sections of the Lands Clauses Act as to lessees. It is therefore proposed to lay before the reader some few cases which have arisen under other special acts of a similar nature. Several cases arose upon the construction of the act incorporating the Hungerford Market Company. That act gave compensation to any tenant from year to year who might sustain injury “in respect of any interest whatsoever, for goodwill, improvements, tenants’ fixtures, or otherwise;” and it was held, that a tenant from year to year, whose tenancy had been put an end to by a legal notice to quit, was entitled to compensation, it appearing that she had been many years in possession under an assurance from her landlord that she should hold the premises as long as she paid her rent. But where a tenancy was for one year, determinable at three months’ notice, ending with the year, with a stipulation against underletting, except with the lessor’s leave, it was held that no compensation was recoverable (v).

Ex parte Farlow.

And where a lessee for years, whose term had expired, obtained leave from the company to hold the premises until they were wanted; it was held that his undertenant from year to year was entitled to receive compensation when he quitted possession (w).

R. v. Hungerford Market Co.

In another case (x) P. held premises under an agreement for one year, and afterwards to quit on three months’ notice at any quarter-day. He was not to underlet or give up possession to another, or make any alterations, without consent of his landlord, and was to leave for his landlord’s benefit all improvements or additions made during his occupation. He made certain improvements, and was afterwards ejected upon due notice to quit: it was held that he was not entitled to compensation for such improvements under the Hungerford Market Act.

And, under the same statute, the assignee of a lessee for years was also held to be entitled to compensation for the loss of his chance of a renewal of the lease ; but not for losses incurred in respect of fixtures and improvements (w).

*R. v. Liverpool and Manchester
R. Co.*

In a case (x) which arose under a special railway act, by which compensation was to be paid for land, &c., taken for the purposes of the act, and also for damage, loss and inconvenience sustained by the owners or occupiers, "such damage to be settled separately from the value of the lands;" and the act also required tenants at will and lessees for years to give up the possession on notice, but gave such tenants and lessees compensation for the value of their unexpired terms; it was held that a lessee for seven years, who received due notice to quit at the expiration of the lease, was not entitled to receive compensation for the loss of his chance of a renewal, although the lease had been several times renewed by the owner, and the tenant had made improvements on the faith of a further renewal being made. And Lord Denman said:—

"It certainly requires very comprehensive words to include such an interest as this, if interest it be. It is merely a hope of renewal on the old terms, which, if there has been an improvement, were not likely to be granted where there would have been a competition. This is different from the case of a sale, and also from the case under the Hungerford Market Act (y), where the words antecedent to 'goodwill' had exhausted the legal interest."

Jubb v. Hull Dock Co.

In a case under a special dock act, which provided that the jury summoned to award compensation for the loss of property taken by the company should deliver their verdict for the money to be paid for the purchase of the lands required for the works, and for the money to be paid for the injury done to the lands of the party by the severance of such lands, and for the money to be paid by way of compensation for the damage occasioned to such lands by the execution of the works, whether for damage sustained before the injury or for future damage, either temporary or permanent; it was held that it was competent for the jury to award compensation for the damage "which the party will sustain by reason of his having to give up his premises as a brewer, until he can obtain suitable premises in which to carry on his business" (z).

If a tenant from year to year, who receives a notice requiring him to quit before his term expires, chooses voluntarily to remain on the premises after his term has expired, he cannot then claim the compensation he would have been entitled to receive if he had obeyed the first notice (a).

Ex parte Nadin.

And it has been decided that a tenant from year to year, who has received a proper notice to quit, cannot claim any portion of the compensation paid to his landlord. This was decided upon a petition under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act and the Manchester Market Act (b). Under the latter, the corporation of Manchester had taken a house and land, in the occupation of D., as yearly tenant, which were the property of N., as owner of the fee. In September, 1846, N. gave D. notice to give up possession on the expiration of six months, namely, at Lady-day, 1847. On the 23rd of March, 1847, an agreement was entered into by N. with the corporation for the purchase of the premises, free from incumbrances, for 3,900*l.* D. did not give up possession of the house at the expiration of the notice, and the corporation had paid the 3,900*l.* into the Bank, according to the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act. This petition was presented by N., praying that the 3,900*l.* might be paid to him upon the execution of a proper conveyance.

Ex parte Nadin.
Tenant not entitled to portion of compensation paid to landlord.

D. contended that, as his tenancy was interrupted in consequence of the premises being required by the corporation, he was entitled to receive part of the compensation money.

The petition was first heard before the Vice-Chancellor, who ordered that a sum of money should be paid to D., on account of his claim to compensation, and for his fixtures, &c., together with his costs, and that the residue of the 3,900*l.* should be paid to N.; but upon appeal Lord Cottenham said:—

D. had not shown any right to remain in the occupation of the property after the expiration of his tenancy, which was determined by the notice, and therefore he had not shown any ground for claiming compensation. The whole amount which had been paid into Court belonged to N., and the order of the Vice-Chancellor must be varied: and he ordered that, upon the execution of a conveyance to the corporation, the whole amount should be paid to N.

In a case (c) in which a dock act empowered the company to excavate lands, stop up streets, and pull down houses, and provided, by sect. 89, that any person “having an estate or interest in any house, not less than a tenancy from year to year,” who should be injured in his “estate or interest,” should be compensated; it was held that the occupier of a public-house, the business of which had been lessened by the removal of the houses in the neighbourhood, was not entitled to compensation in respect of such an injury. In delivering judgment Lord Denman said:—

R. v. London Dock Co.

“The question is, have the company, by the making of the cut, &c., injured the complainants in their estate or interest in these premises? In the argument for the affirmative, much stress was not laid upon the loss of neighbourhood; indeed, it is clear that the company, having become the lawful proprietors of the site, had full power to pull down the houses, to keep it uninhabited, or to turn it to any use, not a nuisance, which yet might deprive the tradesmen in the vicinity of many advantageous customers. It was conceded, also, that an injury merely to the goodwill of the premises, as a public-house, was not, as a substantive injury, within the words of the section; but it was alleged, that the stopping up of any public way, by which the occupier or his customers, local or casual, had the most convenient and direct communication with his house, and the compelling them to go by a circuitous or less convenient route, was an injury to such occupier in his estate and interest in such house; and, that being so, the amount of the usual resort, before and since the act of stopping, might be considered as showing the quantum of damage sustained. Wilkes v. Hungerford Market Co. (d) was relied on, but it has no bearing on the present case. There the act producing the injury was unauthorized by any statute. Here, the act is in its full extent authorized; and it was impossible to make the basin and cut without destroying the neighbourhood, and stopping up these thoroughfares. This necessary consequence must have been foreseen; and, if it had been intended to give any compensation for it, considering its very large and indefinite extent, it is hardly to be conceived that language should have been used so hypothetical, and so vague in its meaning, as the language of the 89th section would be, if so extended. But the language of the section is apt, and its hypothetical form proper, if we read it as intended to provide for the contingent and unforeseen, but direct injury, which might or might not be occasioned by some positive act of the company, as if by their cut, or bridge, or any other work, they had weakened the foundation, darkened the lights, stopped the drains, or done any similar injury to the houses of any person having an estate or interest not less than a tenancy from year to year, the object of which limitation plainly appears to have been to exclude the vexatious claims likely to be made by persons having no permanent interest, on account of trifling inconveniences which might be sustained in the progress of the works. We are therefore of opinion that the claim cannot be sustained."

4, c. 50, s. 67), surveyors or way-wardens are empowered to make drains on lands adjoining any highway, upon paying the owner for the damages sustained thereby, to be settled and paid as the damages for getting materials in inclosed lands are therein directed to be settled and paid. The power of getting such materials is given by the act (sect. 54)—the said surveyor making such satisfaction for the materials, and also for the damage done to such lands, as shall be settled and ascer-plaintiff's buildings, the defendant justified under a local turnpike act, 5 Will. 4, c. xxxvi. Sect. 25 empowered trustees to make the said road through any lands or hereditaments, &c., and for such purpose it should be lawful for the trustees to enter upon such lands, &c., and also to pull down the houses, &c., in the schedule annexed, "making or tendering satisfaction to the owners or proprietors of all private lands, houses, buildings, tenements and premises, so taken or used for the same, or for any loss or damage they may sustain thereby." On the trial, it appeared that the premises in question were private lands and buildings, comprehended in the schedule; that the plaintiff held them for a term of years; that the defendants had taken the lands and pulled down the buildings, and had made satisfaction to the owner of the fee; but no compensation had been tendered to the plaintiff. After verdict for the plaintiff, a rule was obtained to set it aside, on the grounds, 1st. That plaintiff was not entitled to receive any compensation; 2nd. That if he was entitled, he ought to have proceeded under the statute to enforce it; and, lastly, that trespass would not lie. But Patteson, J., said:—

"I entertain no doubt that the words 'owners or proprietors' include tenants for terms of years, and that such tenants are to receive compensation for 'any loss or damage they may sustain.' The plain meaning must be, that any person who suffers is to have satisfaction. It has been argued that compensation is to be given to the landlord for all loss, and that the landlord and tenant are to settle between themselves. I should assent to this, if I could find any clause enabling the tenant to recover in this way; but as there is no such clause, and as it could not have been intended to leave the tenant without remedy, I must infer that the meaning was, that every owner, reddendo singula singulis, should receive satisfaction for his own share."

Lord Denman, C. J., said, on a subsequent day:—

"On the second point, the rule must be absolute. The amount of compensation cannot, generally, be ascertained till the work is done. The effect of the words in question is, that they shall not do it without being liable to make compensation."

And Williams, J., added:—

"Words authorizing trustees to enter lands and remove buildings, making or tained by order of the justices, at a special session for the highways. The act directs (sect. 109) that no action shall be commenced against any person for anything done in pursuance of the act, until twenty-one days' notice thereof has been given, nor after sufficient satisfaction or tender of satisfaction has been made, and in case of an action being brought, if the matter appears to have been done under the act, or if it appears that such action was brought before twenty-one days' notice thereof, or that sufficient satisfaction was made or tendered, the jury shall find a verdict for the defendant. The Court of Common Pleas held, that, under these provisions, tender of satisfaction for damage done in making a drain was not a condition precedent to the right of entry on the land. Also, that the amount of satisfaction could only be ascertained by the justices at a special session, and that assuming it to be the duty of the way-warden to apply at a special session for the purpose, there was no time limited for his doing so; and that the notice of action would not create such a limitation; and lastly, that tender of satisfaction before action brought is not required in cases where the way-warden has complied with the provisions of the act.

And it has been held by the Court of Exchequer (i), (mainly upon the authority of Chamberlain's case (k), and their decision has been followed both by the Queen's Bench (l) and the Common Pleas (m),) that a person who was lessee for three years of a house and shop which had sustained no structural damage was entitled to compensation for loss of trade caused by the stoppage of a highway; Pollock, C. B., saying: "Loss of profits by loss of business is a loss to the goodwill of the business, and the goodwill is part of the value of the property." It was also held by the Court of Exchequer that the company had no right to set off an ultimate possible benefit to the plaintiff's premises against the present pecuniary loss caused by the obstruction (n).

A company of proprietors, by agreement among themselves, made a navigable cut through certain lands on lease for sixty-five years. In 1794, an act of Parliament was passed for making the Swansea Canal; the cut which was previously made was adopted as a part of the undertaking to be made by the act, but no steps were taken under the act, or otherwise, to purchase the reversionary interest of the lands comprised in the lease, and this part of the canal was held under the lease, until its expiration in 1844. (o) Duke of Beaufort v. Patrick, 22 L. J. (Ch.) 489. In another case where there were no commissioners in existence, who alone could award compensation, the Judges of the Queen's Bench differed in opinion, as to whether the compulsory powers of the act could be exercised. It appeared that the act empowered certain persons to make the river Kennet navigable, and to dig and cut through the banks of the river, and to erect in the river, and upon the lands adjoining, weirs, pens, dams, &c., and to do all matters and things necessary for making, maintaining, or improving the navigation, the undertakers first giving satisfaction to the owners of such lands, weirs, &c., as the commissioners named for the purpose should direct, in case the undertakers should not beforehand have agreed with the proprietors of such lands and hereditaments concerning the same. By another section, commissioners were appointed to mediate between the undertakers and the owners of lands and hereditaments intended to be made use of, and to settle satisfaction for such portion of the lands as should be cut, digged, or made use of; and a provision was made for filling up vacancies in the body of the commissioners. If any person should sustain damage in his mills by the owners of the navigation taking away or diverting the water, or any similar injury, the commissioners should, by a jury impanelled as therein directed, assess such damage and award compensation to the party injured. The proprietors of the navigation obstructed the water flowing to the defendant's mill, by the erection of a dam, under the powers of the act. All the commissioners consented to its being made, was afterwards sold, and was purchased by the ancestor of the defendants, who, upon the expiration of the lease, brought an action to recover the land, and obtained a verdict (p); upon which the plaintiff, who was the proprietor of the canal, and who alone had the power of levying tolls under the Canal Act, filed a bill to restrain all further proceedings at law for the recovery of the lands, and to obtain a conveyance to confirm his rights under the Swansea Canal Act, and to assure the possession of the canal to him, upon payment of a compensation under the Canal Act; or that the defendants might be restrained from interfering with the plaintiff's right as an easement, and from preventing him from maintaining or using the canal through the lands.

Compensation.
Duke of Beaufort
v. Patrick.

Sir J. Romilly, M. R., said:—

"It is admitted, that at law the defendants are entitled to this portion of the land covered by the canal.

"The question is, whether there has been such an appropriation of this land to the public, as binds the defendants in equity from disputing it; and if this be established, whether the defendants are entitled to any compensation, and, if any, on what principle. The plaintiff contends that, inasmuch as the lands were included in the maps and books of reference, and were part of the lands authorized to be taken, and as everything that was done is found to have been done with the full consent, and in accordance with the wishes, of the owners and proprietors, which class includes J. B. P. (the owner of the reversion of the lands in question), he must be taken to have dedicated this land to the public for the purpose of this undertaking, and that this will bind the defendants who claim under him. It is contended also, that in no view are the defendants entitled to recover possession of the land: for that, even if it be held that J. B. P. did not dedicate the land to the undertaking, still that the only claim which the defendants can enforce is to be paid a fair and reasonable compensation. The defendants contended, first, that there has been no appropriation to the public of this portion of the canal. Secondly, that nothing which has taken place has been done in such a manner as to affect J. B. P. Thirdly, that even if J. B. P. be bound, the defendants do not claim under, and are in no respect affected by his acts. On the point whether J. B. P. is bound by what took place, it is contended by the plaintiff, on the principle of Dann v. Spurrier (q), that he, who stands by and encourages an act, cannot afterwards complain of it, or interfere with the enjoyment of that which he has permitted to be done. This, as a general proposition, is not disputed by the defendants, but they draw the distinction to be found in Master, &c., of Clare Hall v. Harding (r), and Pilling v. Armi- appointed under the act had died, and there were no commissioners in existence, by whom compensation could be assessed. Under these circumstances, Wightman, Erle and Crompton, Js., were of opinion that the powers of the proprietors to raise weirs for the necessary purposes of the navigation did not cease by reason of the right of the mill owner to recover compensation for consequential damages, through the commissioners, being lost, but Lord Campbell, C. J., was of opinion, that the power to raise the weir and cut off the water flowing to the defendant's mill could only be exercised during the continuance of the body of commissioners, and that, upon their extinction, the extraordinary powers of the proprietors ceased. Kennet and Avon Canal Navigation Co. v. Witherington, 21 Law J. (Q. B.) 419; 18 Q. B. 531.

tage (s), where it is held, that the encouragement given to a lessee will not affect the reversion, or give the lessee, or any one claiming under him, any additional rights, because he knew what his title was, and what his length of tenure in the land was; the permission, therefore, given by the landlord to the lessee cannot bind or affect his reversion. I concur in this principle, but it is not applicable to this case. A cut or private canal has been made by the lessees, with the sanction of J. B. P. This could not bind his reversion, and at the end of the term he might recover his land: but this canal was not of the dimensions required by the act, although it was, when improved and widened, to form a portion of it. J. B. P. had full knowledge of the Swansea Canal Act, and of everything relating to it; his name is mentioned as a proprietor in the act. This extension and improvement of the canal also took place by an arrangement between the duke and the lessees, for the purpose of making it correspond with the rest of the canal: and an arrangement was made between them as to the division of the tolls to be taken by the duke under an agreement in 1797. It is expressly found by the special verdict, that everything done by the duke was with the full consent and approbation of, and in accordance with, the wishes of the owners and proprietors, of whom J. B. P. was one. It would, therefore, be contrary to the principle of equity to which I have referred, if I were to confine this consent to the arrangement between J. B. P. and his tenant, by which the original cut was made, and to permit J. B. P., the owner of the property, who had sanctioned the improvement and widening of the canal through his land, and who had known and approved of the division of tolls which could only be levied by the authority of that act, to assert that he meant this permission to be temporary, only until the lease to one set of the parties to the agreement had concluded; and although the act pointed to permanence, to allow him to insist on a right to destroy that canal, and put an end to the very thing of which he had approved. I am of opinion, therefore, so far as J. B. P. is concerned, and so far as regards any persons claiming through him, that he and they must be held bound to this extent, that he is not entitled to obtain possession of the land covered by the canal, or to interrupt or interfere with its use.

His Honor having discussed this question, said:—

“Although I am of opinion that the defendants cannot be allowed to obtain possession of that portion of the canal, and to interrupt the traffic upon it, yet they must be entitled to receive some fair and reasonable compensation for their interest in the land, which this Court, in the circumstances of the case, will not allow them to take possession of.

“The next question is, on what principle is that compensation to be ascertained? It cannot be ascertained under the powers of the act; for it enacts that the commissioners shall neither be obliged nor allowed to take notice of complaints of persons injured, unless made within three calendar months next after the damage shall have been sustained; and I think it would not be possible to call out the powers of the commissioners. I must, therefore, myself determine on what principle the compensation is to be assessed. I think that the compensation cannot be fixed on the principle of what the value of the reversion was in 1797. The duke, under whom the plaintiff claims, might then have ascertained that value under the powers of the act, and have paid or tendered it to the persons entitled. He cannot obtain any advantage by having abstained from so doing; he has, in fact, taken and paid for (either in money or by the agreement of 1797) the residue of the lease of 1779, so far as it comprised land covered by the canal: but he has not paid for the reversion subject to that lease, and he has waited for this purpose till the lease has expired. Until that period had arisen there was no mode by which the purchasers of the reversion could have enforced payment. If, under the 44th section, they were bound to complain within three months, they could not have proceeded by injunction, because they had sanctioned the making of the canal, and after it was completed the use of it would not have been waste. It is true that they might, within three months after the completion of the canal, have applied to the commissioners for compensation, and so also might the duke. Possibly the smallness of the sum prevented them mutually from having recourse to this process; but the same principle must regulate the decision of the Court, whether the value of the reversion be large or small. During the whole of the time that has elapsed, the money which ought to have been applied in paying the owner of the reversion has been in the pocket of the duke and of those who have claim under him, and during the whole of that time also the reversion in the property has been gradually increasing in value. It is true that the plaintiff cannot be charged on the principle of compound interest, but he has waited till the property he requires for the use of the canal has ceased to be reversionary, and is therefore increased in value as it now exists. It appears to me that the present case is analogous to what occurs under the modern Railway Acts. The company has power to take additional land at a future time for a station or some other purpose. They do not feel at first the want of it, and they delay taking it for several years; in the meantime the value of the land has risen. The company must, in my opinion, pay for such increased value, although, if they had taken the land when they had first the power of doing so, they would have paid less than one-half of the increased value. The circumstance that the railway company had bought up the interest of a lessee in the property, and had allowed the lease to expire before coming to any arrangement with the lessor, would not alter their rights or enable the company to say to the reversioner, you shall receive now only the price for which the reversion might have been bought when the company took the lease.

Compensation.
Duke of Beaufort
v. Patrick.

"I am of opinion, therefore, that the plaintiff must pay for the value of the land at the time when the reversion fell in. At the same time I am of opinion that the defendants are entitled only to be paid the fair and reasonable value of the land, including the minerals, as if the same were not wanted for the purpose of the canal, —not a fanciful amount, based upon calculations of possible advantages not in existence, or upon any supposed diminution of advantage to the rest of their property, under what is usually called 'severance.' I am of opinion that I ought to fix the amount myself, and not send it to any other tribunal to ascertain the value. I propose, therefore, to require the plaintiff and the defendants to lay before me evidence of the value in September, 1844, when the lease of the land occupied by this portion of the canal expired; and I am of opinion that it ought to be estimated as if it were a piece of land of that size and shape lying perfectly detached from the rest of the defendant's land, having no unusual advantages of position; and of the agricultural value of the land adjoining the canal. When this is done, either by agreement between the parties, or by my decision on the evidence laid before me, I will make a decree, ordering that, upon payment of the sum so ascertained, and interest upon it from 1844, the defendants are to execute all proper conveyances of the land so taken."

that a jury would be summoned to assess compensation to him for his interest in the lands; and the reversioner, who contended that the company had no authority to take more than a portion of the lands, applied for an injunction to restrain the company from summoning a jury:—the Vice-Chancellor refused the injunction.

Hillcoat v. Archbishops of Canterbury and York.

The following is an important case (u) as to the mode of assessing the value of a churchyard, under the provisions of a special act which authorized the company to take the yard under certain restrictions.

Mode of assessing value of churchyard.

The declaration stated, that by their act of Parliament the L. and B. R. Co. were not to interfere with a church or with the yard attached, without the consent of the Bishop of Chester, and payment by the company to the defendants of a sum to be agreed upon between the defendants and the company, in ascertaining which regard should be had to the cost of a site for a new church, and to the value of the yard. That, on payment by the company to the defendants of the sum so to be agreed upon, the said church and yard should vest in the company, and the sum so paid should be employed by the defendants in purchasing a new site, and paying the plaintiff for the value of the yard. It was then averred that a sum was agreed upon and paid by the company to the defendants, and thereupon the church and yard vested in the company, whereupon the bishop gave his consent; that the said sum was sufficient to purchase a new site, and also to pay the plaintiff the value of the said yard. Breach, non-payment of the value. It appeared that the defendants before action offered the plaintiff a sum which they had determined to be the value of the yard, which was consecrated ground, and, as such, its value to the plaintiff was less than it would be to the company when applied to secular uses. The judge directed the jury, that the act did not make the determination of the defendants conclusive on the plaintiff, and that, in estimating their damages, they were at liberty to value the ground as applicable to secular uses. On an application for a new trial, it was held that the direction given by the judge was correct.

Lord Truro, C. J., said:—

“The main point discussed upon the argument was the true construction of the 10th and 11th sections of the statute before mentioned. [These sections were read, and his lordship stated the facts proved at the trial.]

“It was now contended first, that the defendants were constituted and appointed arbitrators, with power to determine the value conclusively, as between the plaintiff and the company, of the ground and buildings not forming part of the site of the church, and that the jury ought to have been so directed. Secondly, that the jury ought to have been directed to estimate the value to the plaintiff of such ground and buildings as being irrevocably consecrated and bound to spiritual uses, and incapable by the plaintiff of any other application. We are of opinion that upon the true construction of the statute, the defendants were not constituted and appointed arbitrators to determine conclusively upon the value of the property for which the plaintiff was entitled to be paid. The language of the statute does not warrant any such construction; the defendants were authorized to agree with the company as to the amount to be paid with reference to all the objects which the defendants were authorized to accomplish, and they had an unfettered discretion in regard to the amount which they should require to be paid, with very specific directions as to the sums which they would have to pay and disburse out of the amount which they should agree to accept.

“The second point was, that the jury had been misdirected upon the question of the damages. The alleged misdirection consisted in the jury being told that they were not bound to estimate the value of the ground and buildings, for which the plaintiff was entitled to be paid, as land irrevocably appropriated to spiritual purposes, of which the plaintiff could make no pecuniary advantage, but that it was competent to them to form their estimate of the value with reference to all the circumstances that had appeared in evidence before them; and the question being left upon the evidence in the cause to the unfettered judgment of the jury, the Court is of opinion that there was no misdirection. The question of value was clearly for the jury, and it may not be very plain by what precise rule or test the value should be estimated. The owner is to be paid the value, and that enactment is unaccompanied by any words of qualification or restriction, and there seems no reason for construing the words in any other than their ordinary sense and meaning. The act of Parliament was passed for the purpose of withdrawing the church ground and buildings from the spiritual appropriation, and applying them to secular uses; and in connexion with that determination, the duty was imposed of paying the owner the value of the ground and buildings not forming the site of the church, and, in the absence of any peculiar rule being prescribed for ascertaining such value, it is reasonable to infer that the value was to be ascertained in relation to the nature and situation of the property generally, and its applicability to ordinary purposes discharged of any prescribed appropriation. If the company thought they had any claim to take land to be used by them for secular purposes, but that the owner was to be paid only value estimated upon the footing of its being irrevocably appropriated to spiritual purposes, they ought to have asked Parliament for a distinct enactment to that effect, when the parties would have been heard upon it; but having obtained the power to take the property discharged of its spiritual appropriation, and to apply it to secular purposes connected with pecuniary profits, upon the terms of paying the value generally, or their right to insist upon having such value estimated by some peculiar and restricted test, is by no means obvious. By the appropriation of property to ecclesiastical or spiritual purposes, the owner voluntarily sacrifices the pecuniary value of the property so appropriated, but he makes that sacrifice to obtain an object which he estimates of greater value; but when that object is entirely withdrawn from him by the application of the property against his will to secular uses, and those uses connected with pecuniary profit, it does not seem consistent with justice to estimate the value to the owner upon the footing of its irrevocable appropriation to those spiritual purposes from which it has been already withdrawn.”

Rule discharged.

*Report
and Evidence on Compensation.*

4. Report and the Evidence given before the Lords' Select Committee, on the Principle of assessing Compensation for Lands.

During the Session of 1845, the House of Lords appointed a Select Committee to take into consideration the practicability and the expediency of establishing some principle of compensation to be made to the owners of real property, whose land, &c., may be compulsorily taken for the construction of public railways; and also further to take into consideration the question of severance, and that of injury to residences; and to report to the House. The following Report was made to the House:—

That the committee have met, and taken into consideration the various matters referred to them. They have summoned witnesses, not numerous, but of great practical experience in the dealings between the railway companies and the landed proprietors. In the evidence of all these witnesses, but more especially in those of Mr. Duncan, an agent of the Eastern Counties Railway Company, and of Mr. Cramp, a land valuer in Kent, will be found ample illustrations of the nature of the transactions between the parties.

Upon the questions of severance and damage, however, the committee are of opinion that it is impossible to establish any fixed rate upon which the damage arising from severance, and other injuries to property, can be assessed and compensated.

With respect to the land, &c., actually taken, the witnesses who were examined state, that, to the marketable value of the property taken, they add, in their valuations, a percentage, on the ground of the sale being compulsory. The amount of this percentage varies with the views of the different witnesses, whose evidence will be found in the Appendix; but the committee are of opinion that a very high percentage amounting to not less than 50*l.* per cent. upon the original value ought to be given in compensation for the compulsion only to which the seller is bound to submit, the severance and the damage being distinct considerations. In some of the evidence, especially of Mr. Duncan (post, 264), it appears to the committee that a very unfair view is taken of the injury done to proprietors, and of the compensation due to them.

The committee are of opinion that many cases occur in which it is necessary to consider the land, &c., not merely as a source of income, but as the subject of expensive embellishment, and subservient to the enjoyment and recreation of the proprietor.

Public advantage may require all these private considerations to be sacrificed; but as it is the only ground on which a man can be justly deprived of his property and enjoyments, so, in the case of railways, though the public may be considered ultimately the gainers, the immediate motive to their construction is the interest of the speculators, who have no right to complain of being obliged to purchase, at a somewhat high rate, the means of carrying on their speculation.

It is to be observed, that the price of the land purchased, and the compensation for that which is injured, form together but a small proportion of the sum required for the construction of a railway, so that no apprehension need be entertained of discouraging their formation, by calling upon the speculators to pay largely for the rights which they acquire over the property of others.

In the course of the committee's deliberations, the question of injury to mineral property, by the construction of railways over it, was very forcibly brought before them; and they are of opinion, that (notwithstanding the improvement in the law relating thereto made in the present session) it is one that requires still further consideration.

*Report
and Evidence on Compensation.*

The committee are also of opinion—

1. That, before any road or canal, or railway or dock bill shall be read a first time, there be laid on the table of this House a statement of the length and breadth of the space which is intended or sought to be taken for the proposed works, and to give up which the consent of the owners of the land has not been obtained; together with the names of such owners, and the heights above the surface of all proposed works on the ground of each owner (x).
2. That a return shall also be presented at the same time of the names of the owners or occupiers of any houses situated within three hundred yards of the proposed works who shall have, before the 31st December preceding the introduction of the bill into Parliament, deposited written objections to the said railway, with the public officer appointed to receive the plans of the said railway within the parish or township in which their property is situate; or, if the railway should not be proposed to be carried through that township, in the one through which the railway is to pass in the manner objected to by the above-mentioned parties (y).
3. That where any party or parties have appeared and contested any such bills at the bar or in the committees of the House, it shall be lawful for the House or committees, if in their discretion they shall think fit, to direct the costs in whole or in part of such party or parties to be paid by the opposite party promoting the bill (z).

And the committee have directed the minutes of evidence taken before them to be laid before your Lordships.

The following are extracts from these minutes:—

29th May, 1845.—The EARL FITZWILLIAM in the Chair.

Mr. Charles Parker, law agent of the London and Birmingham Railway Company, examined:—

Can you give generally any information to the committee as to the number of years' purchase at which the land was purchased, keeping that question entirely distinct from the question of severance and damage?—I think it is hardly possible to give that information through the line. Generally speaking, those agreements are made in one gross sum; they are sometimes divided afterwards, but not by any means generally. Generally speaking, the compensation and the price of the land are mixed up together.

Have you any idea of what is the proportion between the severance damage and the value of the land?—That varies in almost every case. If you take the line at the side of a field, the damage is very inconsiderable, compared with going right through the middle of it, and the same with buildings. That makes a great variation in the compensation.

Have you ever built any farm buildings, in consequence of your going so near the old ones as to make them inconvenient?—We have frequently allowed money for it.

You have never done it yourselves?—No. I think that is always better done, (x) Now provided for by Lords' S. O., No. 182, Sect. 10 (Session 1865).

(y) See Lords' S. O., No. 182, Sect. 10 (Session 1865).

and cheaper done, and more satisfactorily done, by the parties themselves; but I have had the buildings accurately valued, and then gone to the parties, and said, "That is the sum we are told it will cost; if you like to take that sum and lay it out yourself, we will pay you;" and I have found that generally preferred—I may say universally.

Although you cannot state how much is paid for severance, can you state about what proportion of the total price severance forms?—I think about half. It varies very much; but if you took the average of all compensations, I think it would come out at about half. I think that where 2,000*l.* is paid to a landed proprietor, in the generality of cases, about 1,000*l.* is for the land, and 1,000*l.* for the compensation. Of course, in many cases, where there is no severance, we do not expect to pay at the same rate, but we always pay a great deal more than the market value.

The severance made in the case of a house, or of a gentleman's park, would be infinitely greater than the severance in going over a field where a flock of sheep are kept?—Yes.

But you would pay a severance for the field?—Yes; we always pay an additional sum, either in the price of the land, or professedly for severance, in all cases.

Mr. John Duncan, solicitor to the Eastern Counties Railway, examined:—

Can you state the number of years' purchase which has been given by the company for the land required for the construction of the railway?—It has depended on circumstances. It has generally been thirty to thirty-five years' purchase, after getting at the net rent; but the question of compensation or severance, of course, varies in every case, according to the extent of damage done.

Do you think that you could inform the committee, by referring to documents in your possession, about the number of years' purchase which has been paid for land absolutely taken, as distinct from the questions of severance and damage?—I have no doubt of that.

Can you state the maximum and minimum which has been given with reference to compensation and severance?—No; there is certainly neither maximum nor minimum as guiding rules.

With reference to the value of the land, what has practically been the rule you have acted upon?—With reference to the value of the land, I know that the general rule we take in the country is to get as nearly as possible at the net rent paid, or the net letting value, and having got that, to give a certain number of years' purchase for the compulsory sale.

How many years' purchase?—I have said thirty to thirty-five.

Then afterwards you add to that, what will be required for compensation?—Yes.

In towns it is different. Where we go through property in towns, we do not give the same number of years' purchase for buildings as for land.

How many years' purchase do you give for buildings; for houses, barns and so forth?—That differs very much, according to the class of houses; it runs between twenty years and twenty-six years.

Do you pay for annoyance besides?—We pay for annoyance besides, where the party has property left beyond what we take. But where we take a particular owner's house, and he has no other house in the neighbourhood, we simply pay him the value of that house so purchased compulsorily: we give him more than the market value of it, because we have compelled him to sell it to us for our objects.

Was the dissentient party generally satisfied at last?—I should say certainly. They had only to employ an intelligent surveyor, and obtain satisfactory settlement through his means. There is no doubt that surveyors, from the practice of the last ten years in railway matters, have become so conversant with every species of damage done by railways, and injuries done to landowners, that if a landowner chooses an intelligent surveyor he is sure to get his case protected. The surveyor goes upon the land, and he does not look merely at the land taken, but he looks deeply into present and future injury, and far off at every species of practical damage that may occur, and makes out the claim of the landowner; and then the surveyor of the company either consents to each item of claim, or disputes it; and they ultimately agree upon the full amount to be paid and all that is to be done by the company for the landowner.

However destructive to the comfort and happiness of an individual it may be to have a railway pass rather close to him, unless it goes over land that belongs to him he has no kind of claim?—I think it is so. I know that a case has occurred under our railway acts of Parliament, where damage was done to an adjoining owner; but he was not actually on the line; he was not in the book of reference. We had nothing to pay him for going over his land; we simply passed by him; and, in making a bridge approach, the road in front of his house was much raised, and we put him to positive inconvenience. I remember this case where the road was thus raised in front of a gentleman's house:—He used to go from his garden to the road upon a level, but after this alteration he had to come out of his garden-gate, and walk up three or four steps to reach the road. He was not an owner upon the line, and he contended unsuccessfully before arbitrators, that the company were bound to pay him compensation. But I know that since that case the courts of law have construed the railway acts so that any person placed in a similar position is entitled to compensation, and that he can go to a jury to settle what the compensation to be paid him should be (a). But if a gentleman's house is merely injured by the noise, or in respect of the sight of the railway, in matters of that kind I doubt very much indeed whether the act of Parliament would give compensation to such a party: you must have something more close in point of injury than that as groundwork for compensation. In the case I have mentioned, the raised road was quite close to the person's dwelling, and was an evident and palpable mischief to him; but in the case of the sight of the railway, or the noise of the railway trains or engine, or matters of that kind, those injuries are too far off from compensation for the acts of Parliament to reach them; at least I apprehend so. I apprehend, that unless the owner of a house, situated in the position of being annoyed by the sight or noise, was an owner upon the line, he would not be able to recover compensation.

You have as good a right to erect an embankment opposite a person's house, upon land which belongs to you, as any other owner would have to erect a house there?

—Yes, for the public object sanctioned by act of Parliament (b).

You say that you paid five or six and twenty years' purchase for a house: if you take the whole house and premises are any additions made to the value, for annoyance of removing?—Yes; we always ascertain what fixtures are destroyed.

Is any addition made for the annoyance of a person being compelled to change his domicile?—That is covered by the number of years' purchase. We give a higher rate than the market value, to cover the compulsory sale and the annoyance of moving.

You said just now that the average rate was twenty to twenty-six years for buildings: is that a rate which you consider higher than the market price?—Certainly it is, upon our line, where property is of a very low class indeed.

What should you consider the average market price?—It depends upon the class of property. I am speaking of houses in London; in Shoreditch and Spitalfields and thereabouts.

(a) See ante, 218.

(b) But see ante, 224, 245.

Can you state how many years, in addition to what you consider the market price, you are in the habit of giving for house property?—I believe, that to cover the compulsory sale and annoyance, and so forth, something like five or six years' purchase is added to the actual market value of the house.

Then the market value, according to that rate, would be about fifteen or twenty years' purchase?—It depends upon the property the railway goes through. In the property which the Eastern Counties Railway goes through at Shoreditch, the houses are of a very low description, and in those cases the property is not worth above fourteen or fifteen years' purchase.

And it depends also upon the state of repair of the property?—Certainly.

In the case of large houses in the country, fifteen to eighteen years' purchase would not describe their value?—It would not. It depends upon the class of tenants, and whether there is a lease. There are a great many details which must be looked at in the valuation of a house. If the house has not had a tenant for three or four years, you cannot get the same for it as you can if a tenant has a lease of it for fourteen years, who is a responsible tenant.

Besides which, is not it the fact that a large country house never pays a rent equal to its cost? For example, suppose a house cost 10,000*l.*, it would not let for above 200*l.* a year in the country.—Very likely not.

Therefore thirty years' purchase upon such a rent as that would be a very inadequate sum to pay?—There is no doubt, that if a railway company takes a house that has cost 10,000*l.*, they do not pay 10,000*l.* for it; they only pay what could be got for it, what it would sell for, together with the additional compensation for taking it compulsorily.

But supposing you turn the proprietor out of his house?—Parliament does it.

Ought you not to pay him for it?—We do compensate him to the full extent of its value, and a good deal more. If he wants to preserve his house, and to prevent its being taken for a public work, he must go to Parliament, and beg their protection for his house. Parliament gives the company leave to go through it, on paying what it is worth.

Then his only way of protecting himself is to get the bill thrown out?—To get the bill thrown out, or to make the company deviate.

He may be quite certain that you will not pay the full value of the house?—We will not pay what it cost. There would be no end to that; we might pay the most fanciful prices.

Supposing a person had spent 10,000*l.* upon building a house, and he had not been able to live in it since he had built it, but that he had let it to a tenant, and he had not been able to get for it, at the end of five or six or ten years since it had been built, more than 100*l.*, 200*l.*, or 300*l.* a year, should you compensate him upon the principle of taking the value of the property at what it had cost him, namely, 10,000*l.*, or should you compensate him upon the principle of taking the value of the property at the sum it let for, whether it was 100*l.*, 200*l.*, or 300*l.* a year?—There is no doubt that we should take it upon the latter principle, adding anything to the price that we thought ought to be paid; and if we are in error there is a tribunal to appeal to, namely a jury, to settle whether he is right, or whether the company be right. The jury give him as much as they think fit, and we are obliged to pay what the jury award. If, upon the evidence given, they choose not to adopt our valuation, but instead, that of the house owner, we are obliged to submit to the verdict; but he is obliged to submit to it, if the jury take the company's view.

In a case where a railway goes in front of an old ruin, for instance, Gervoise Abbey, or Bolton Abbey, or any other well known abbey, and goes near it, so as to spoil entirely the picturesque effect of the abbey, on what principle do you compute your compensation?—I am not aware of any such case; but I rather think the company would be advised, and that they would consider, that the public utility must prevail, and that they should pay nothing for any loss of beauty, or anything else. If a company went through the grounds of the proprietor to whom the abbey belonged, or if they went so near the ruin as to prevent the erection of a house on the same spot, if that was contemplated, if the course of the line would touch his pocket injuriously, we should have to pay for that; but I think that, for the mere destruction of an object of beauty or interest, we should not have to pay anything. If a party went before a jury, and there was any claim set up of that kind, we should fight it very resolutely.

On the ground that the party was entitled to no compensation for injury to a ruin?—Yes; that it should be no injury to his pocket, and, therefore, he had nothing to receive.

However hallowed the ruin might be in his estimation?—That is so. He must come to Parliament, and pray of Parliament not to grant a bill for a railway to run near so beloved a place. But if it was a beautiful spot, he should get a station made near it, and turn it into building land.

Mr. John Clutton, land agent of the South-Eastern Railway Company, examined:—

Can you give any information respecting the price which has been paid for the land taken, including the price of the land, compensation for severance, and other damages?—Each case had depended upon its own merits entirely; I think the total sum is 600,000*l*.

For how many miles of railway is that?—They have on the whole about 120 miles, including works in course of construction.

That is, upon the average, 6000*l*. a mile?—Yes.

Does that include a great deal of house property?—It includes the Bricklayers' Arms branch and the Dover terminus. I think those are the largest portions of house property taken by the Dover Railway. The London terminus is the joint terminus of the three companies, the Dover, the Croydon, and the Brighton.

Then 6000*l*. a mile would be considerably larger than what may be considered as having been paid for land?—Yes; I should state that about 3000*l*. a mile would be the average upon the Dover Railway, including the branches, for land simply.

How many acres a mile?—It varies so much. On many of the branch lines it has not exceeded ten acres a mile. Upon the main line, where the works are much heavier, I suppose the quantity has been at least fourteen to fifteen acres a mile. I am merely giving opinions now; I have not gone into the figures precisely.

Can you give to the committee more detailed and accurate information?—If your lordships desire it. I am now purchasing land for the Dover Railway Company, which would cost, I suppose, about 3000*l*. a mile.

That is mere land?—Nearly so.

That comprises both the severance and compensation?—Yes; that is upon the Canterbury and Ramsgate and Margate branch. I can give accurate information as to those two branches, because they are more particularly in my recollection.

In some part of the Dover Railway is not the quantity taken less than ten acres to a mile?—I do not think we take so little as that anywhere.

Not near the coast?—In many places near the coast we have taken a great deal more than that. In all the part between Folkestone and Dover I should think it would be double that amount, because the cuttings and embankments are very heavy indeed there.

What is the usual width you can be content with?—I never saw it taken at less than a chain wide, and that would give eight acres to a mile: that we always take without cuttings or embankments.

How many years' purchase are given?—I have universally given, since the funds have been at their present price, thirty-three years' purchase to begin with.

How many years' purchase for severance?—That must depend upon the amount of damage done.

How many years' purchase have you ever given for severance?—Many hundred per cent. in some cases. I will mention a case, in which twenty-five acres of land were valued at 2,500*l.*, and the amount given was upwards of 10,000*l.* That would be 400*l.* per cent. upon the value of the land for severance and consequential damage.

In the ordinary case of going through a farm, where you cut a field in half, and pay 100*l.* an acre for thirty-three years' purchase for the land, what would you expect to pay for the severance for dividing the field, besides the purchase of the land?—I do not think any general rule can be laid down; it depends upon the situation with reference to the homestead, and with reference to roads.

And with reference to water?—I think there are clauses in every railway act I have seen, that the company shall provide an equal quantity of water to be cut off. We do not generally take that into our estimate; we generally provide it.

In some cases is not that almost impossible?—Then we pay for the loss; because, whether it is one acre or 100 cut off, of course the amount of damage done must depend upon that. In estimating for lines of railway, when I give evidence before Parliament, I always estimate twenty-five per cent. for a forced sale, and fifty per cent. for severance, putting in the first instance a high value.

Putting in the first instance thirty-three years' purchase, then twenty-five per cent. for forced sale, and fifty per cent. for severance?—Yes. In some instances the severance will be 100 or 200 per cent., in other cases nothing; depending entirely upon the circumstances of each case.

In that case where 10,000*l.* was given, was that given to ward off opposition, or on account of the detriment that was done to the place?—The amount of the injury was determined by reference, and I presume the referees took into their consideration the damage done to the estate.

You attribute it, then, to the detriment that was done to the place, and not to the object of warding off the opposition of the individual?—Perhaps I should make myself better understood by giving this explanation. The case was mentioned of my Lord A.; I think I had better adhere to that case. The agreement was entered into prior to the passing of the act, the company undertaking to pay all the costs. It was referred to two arbitrators and an umpire, a barrister; they heard evidence upon the case, and gave their award of 11,000*l.* I think I can state that the value of the land was about 100*l.* an acre; that would amount to about 2,800*l.* The difference was made up of damage to the estate generally, and to the mansion more particularly; that would be about 8,200*l.*

How near did the railway pass to the mansion?—I think it was a third of a mile. There was a turnpike road between the railway and the mansion.

Can you form any judgment what proportion in general the amount given for damage and severance bears to the value of the land?—In the estimate for the construction of a railway I estimate fifty per cent. upon the cost of the land for severance and damage, except in some extraordinary cases, and then I always put on an amount beyond that, depending upon the injury done.

You say that you never take less than twenty-two yards; what is the absolute width used for the two lines of rail?—Four feet eight and a half is the gauge of the Dover line; and you require about five feet between the two lines of a railway, and about half that width on each side of the railway simply for ballasting, making about twenty feet for the mere ballasting and the rails.

Supposing it is upon a level, do you still require that space on each side?—We make a small bank on each side, besides a ditch. The companies generally suffer great inconvenience, when the railway is not wide enough for the workmen to work during the passing of the trains.

In cutting through hills what width do you take?—It depends upon the depth of the cutting, and upon the angle at which the side will stand.

The question refers to the railway line itself?—We take the same width for the railway line, and add to that the width of the embankment or the cutting.

You said that thirty-three years' purchase was what you generally offered on the part of the company. What is the ordinary selling price of land in Kent?—I should say that in the Weald of Kent the ordinary price, before the construction of the railway, was five or six and twenty years' purchase. I think I stated that thirty-three years' purchase was only since the high price of the funds. The formation of the railway has increased the price of land in the Weald of Kent about two years' purchase.

What is the average rent?—I should say 1*l*.; I am speaking of the Weald of Kent. Before the funds were at their present price, the amount offered by the company was thirty years' purchase for the value of the land; seven and a half years for compulsory sale, and fifteen for severance; making fifty-two. Since the funds have been at 100, we have paid thirty-three years' purchase for the land, eight and a quarter years' purchase for compulsory sale, and sixteen and a half for severance.

Do you know of any instance of a residence being injured, the owner of which had no property on the line?—I think it depends entirely upon the class of residence.

Do you know of any instance where the owner has complained that his residence has been injured, having no property on the line?—I think I have known instances of gentlemen's residences, where a complaint has been made of injury; but I do not think they were injured after the formation of the railway. During the construction there is no doubt they were injured to some extent.

In those cases did you consider yourselves bound to take into consideration their complaints and claims?—Not at all; that would open so wide a field, that it would be impossible for any company to construct their works if that field were opened.

In the case of the Brighton Railway, they did give large sums of money for the right to make tunnels through the hills?—Yes; in two cases they took other land, as well as the right to tunnel under.

Supposing a railway cuts through a hill for the length of a mile: upon what principle would you value the loss to the proprietor of the land?—I think I should value it as any other land taken.

The tunnel does not hurt the land above?—I never saw any case, except at Primrose hill (where the soil was all carried away), where it did not do material damage to the land above; nearly the whole material of the tunnel goes to the top.

Suppose a tunnel under a town?—Then the material must be all carried away. I was speaking of agricultural land.

Have there been many cases to your knowledge of a tunnel under a town?—Yes.

How have the householders been compensated in that case?—In the case to which I have just referred they are now constructing the tunnel without an act of Parliament. We were obliged to purchase the right to pass under the houses, simply because the soil belonged to the owners. We paid very small sums for it. We paid each man, I think, 40*l*.; and in the case of parties having larger houses, of course, they were paid somewhat more.

*Report
Compensation.*

How deep below the level is it?—Sixty feet.

How were those houses supplied with water?—They have all wells.

Are you below the level?—We are below the level. We have entered into a covenant with each of the parties to supply the same quantity that they had before, if they required it.

With respect to the standing orders, is there not now a sort of understanding between railway companies, that it is not professional to oppose each other upon the standing orders?—I think it is understood that where bills are not opposed they are sure to get through the standing orders; and when they are opposed there are great doubts about it; probably one being quite as accurate as the other.

Is it not the understanding that a railway company A. opposing the branch of railway company B. would not think it professional to oppose it on the standing orders?—I was not aware that there was any implied understanding of that sort.

Is it not the fact that there is scarcely a railway bill of any length that ever has complied, or ever will comply, strictly with the standing orders?—It is quite impossible. I am acting now under one which passed in the last session of parliament, and I should think there are at least one-fifth of the fields put down to wrong names; and that passed simply because no one opposed it. Now, there are other bills which I know have been thrown out, which had not one quarter of the objections which were to that bill.

Do you think it necessary always to enter strictly into the title of the land you take?—That is not my department; I am not the solicitor. The only answer that I can give is, that railway companies do not require a selling title; they simply require a holding title, not a market title.

Do you know whether the railway companies pay the expense of all that?—Entirely, in all the arrangements that I have had to do with.

Supposing a house had cost 10,000*l.*, and had been finished last year, and that your railway came through it, what compensation would you give the owner of that house; would you give him the amount of money that he had so expended?—Yes; and something more.

You would not take the house and give him thirty years' purchase upon 200*l.*, which might be the rent he might get for it, but you would take into consideration the amount of money which he had just laid out upon it?—I think you must as nearly as possible place the man in the same position as he was in before the railway came. I think no railway company should inflict a hardship upon a private individual if they can ascertain the facts.

Would you not also allow something for the annoyance of being removed?—Yes; if he had the year before expended 10,000*l.* for his own comfort, and the company come and take that property away, I should say he should have something beyond the 10,000*l.* for his removal.

31 May, 1845.—The EARL FITZWILLIAM in the Chair.

Mr. Edward Driver, surveyor, examined:—

Can you give the committee any general information respecting the rates at which land has been purchased by railways, distinguishing the price of the land from the severance and damages?—I think I am in a situation to give your lordships information upon the Great Western line, in which I was concerned, having purchased about the first sixty miles from London, and the portion of it from London to Maidenhead. I gave evidence upon that before Parliament, and subsequently treated, and purchased the same, and kept an account of the result; and I can give that information. The quantity of land was 190 acres from London to Maidenhead. My estimate and evidence before Parliament upon the average was 208*l.* an acre, including every description of expense. I found afterwards, by taking out the figures, that it came to the following result:—that 117*l.* an acre was the cost for the land only; but, including the severance, it was 194*l.* an acre.

That would make the severance 77*l.*?—Yes; and the tenant's interest was 15*l.* That produced an average of 209*l.* an acre for the land and severance and tenant's interest, my evidence having stated before Parliament an average of about 208*l.*, so that I was within 1*l.* an acre of my first estimate, showing that I had formed a tolerably correct estimate. Upon general principle, my mode is this:—to charge the land first at the full rent; if it is worth 35*s.* an acre I should call it 40*s.* an acre. I then put it at thirty-three years' purchase. I add a fourth to that for compulsory sale, making forty-one years and a half. Then I find a moiety more must be added, making sixteen years and a half purchase more, to cover severance, which makes fifty-eight years' purchase; and I have generally said that it comes to sixty years' purchase to cover everything.

Have you ever been employed as an arbitrator?—Yes, in several cases.

Have you found that your colleagues have thought that this was a right principle?—I have found that they may have asked more; but they have always been satisfied when the verdict has been to this amount.

Have the gentlemen that you have met with in that way admitted the principles that you have just stated?—Quite so.

This was at the commencement of the Great Western Railway?—Yes.

There was more opposition then to the sale of land for railway purposes than there is now?—We wanted to pay the full fair price for everything. We had only two juries in the whole of the distance between London and Maidenhead, and those were both very different cases; they were market gardens, where the profits were very enormous. The grower or occupier showed the produce of pears and apples, and what they could get for them in Covent-garden market.

Would you not say that that is rather valuable land upon the greatest part of the line to Maidenhead?—It is more valuable than upon the Brighton line; but I valued upon the Brighton line also. I am quite satisfied that this mode of calculation would ensure full justice to the landowners, without introducing any fancy value or extravagant demands.

You do not take into consideration that the property of the individual is most likely benefited by the railway?—I think not.

It is, no doubt, your opinion that landed property is generally very much improved in value by having a railway run through it?—I think it is; I think it has equalized the value of land very much.

In letting land for building purposes upon large estates, the ground rents fixed have some reference to what are expected to be the profits of the builders?—In that case the locality is the inducement to the person to take the land, and therefore it does affect the value; but that is a sort of private agreement between parties.

Does not the railway stand very much in reference to the land upon which it is placed in the same relation that houses do to the land upon which they are built?—As far as residences go, I think it does.

Supposing that a railway was to go through a gentleman's residence that had just been finished at the expense of 10,000*l.*, how should you value what he ought to have; should you do it by reference to that cost of 10,000*l.*, or upon what principle?—If I felt that the railway had prejudiced him, either as to letting or as to sale, I should exercise my judgment in considering what would be the amount of the depreciation on this account.

Suppose it goes through the house and destroys it?—I should pay him the full cost of the building.

And the value of the land it stood upon?—Yes; and compensation for any inconvenience he sustained besides, or disappointment.

In the case of taking a gentleman's residence in that way, would you be guided by the amount of money he had just expended, or would you be guided by the rent which you might think that gentleman might get for the house if he let it?—I think I should be guided by the money he had spent, thinking that the railway company ought to pay for the whole amount of the loss he had suffered. I believe that has always been the case.

You do not consider the letting value of the place to be the real criterion of its value to the owner?—Certainly not; and particularly with reference to a residence.

You do not consider that any large country house lets for anything like the money which it has cost to erect it?—Certainly not. Gentlemen are always desirous of letting their houses, if they can get a good tenant, at a very moderate rent, in order to ensure the house being kept warm. I have houses which I should be glad to let upon those terms. A house, if untenanted during the winter, suffers most materially.

It may frequently happen that a landed proprietor of considerable fortune may, from temporary circumstances, wish to let a residence for two, three, or five, or a short term of years, in which case the rent he gets is no criterion of the value of the property?—Certainly not. I should think the rent would hardly be the interest of the value of the materials to be sold, it is of so little consequence.

What was the average money that the land between Shoreham and Chichester cost?—I have not the means of telling the average very accurately; but I should think it will amount to an average of 220*l.* and 230*l.* an acre.

It goes through parts of the best land in the county of Sussex?—It goes through very fine agricultural land.

Do you think that the circumstances which guided you in coming to fifty-eight years' purchase would equally guide you now if you had to do it again?—Precisely. I have gone upon the same principle in valuing from Brighton to Chichester.

In that distance to Maidenhead, can you state what was the lowest value of any particular lands, and what was the highest value of any particular lands?—In that district there was some very good land; perhaps the average would be about 50*s.* an acre as the rental for agricultural purposes, and I do not think any was under 30*s.*

Would you think it advisable that a minimum number of years' purchase should be laid down below which no land should be taken by a railway company?—I think fifty-eight years' purchase would be a very full price to fix as a minimum.

There are many cases in which there is no payment required for severance?—There are some cases, certainly.

In those cases would it be fair to put fifty-eight years' purchase as the price?—No, I do not think it would; nor do I think it possible to make any general rule applicable to every case. If you take the corner or a portion of a field, it may do not a shilling damage beyond the extent of land taken.

You do not think a minimum price necessary for the protection of the small landed proprietors?—I am quite sure there is no occasion for it. Railway companies are always anxious to pay liberally for everything they take.

Besides, does not your view of the compensation which ought to be given, depend very much upon the shape of the ground, whether the railway passes it upon a level, or upon an embankment, or in a cutting?—I do not think that affects it much, because if it is upon an embankment they must provide communications, and if it is upon a level they can do no more. It more affects it when it cuts the estate or the field diagonally. Sometimes it goes in a parallel line with the boundary of the field, without doing half so much damage as in the other case.

Though the compensation for severance must be uncertain in its amount, the number of years' purchase on a full rent is a certain fixed quantity?—Yes.

So also is the addition to be made to that upon the ground of the sale being compulsory?—Yes.

Have we not, then, composed of those two items, a fixed total?—I do not see any objection to that; that would be forty-one and a half years' purchase for the first purchase of the land, independent of any compensation for the severance.

Here then we have a fixed quantity?—Yes; but I wish my observation to be understood to refer to freehold land.

You spoke of forty-one and a half years' purchase as being upon a full rent; do you think it would come to something like forty-five upon the actual rent paid?—I think not.

Take the case of an acre of larch plantation, twenty years old, of thriving trees; how would you value that?—That would be a special case, and it would require particular consideration. The value of that must be the timber.

The timber may be worth not above 100*l.* an acre, yet in fifty years more it might be worth 1000*l.*?—This is just one of those cases in which I do not think it possible to provide a general rule.

But in that case it would be the price to be paid for the timber, and that price would depend upon the probable increasing value of the timber?—A plantation of firs is a very uncertain thing, certainly.

It is in the nature of a reversionary interest?—Yes; and has a great deal to do with the fluctuation of price.

In a private agreement between an owner of land and a builder, who is about to speculate upon it, the ground rent will to a great degree vary according to the expectation that the builder may have of more or of less profit. Does not the same principle apply to any other work which may be taken upon the speculation of private individuals, whether they be simply individuals, or united together in the form of a company?—I think in railway companies there is no analogy whatever with building speculations, or with turnpike roads or other public improvements, because railway companies are so organized that the public cannot derive any advantage from them or from their contiguity, except where there are stations; therefore you can make no advantage of railways as you would of turnpike roads going through estates.

Then, if that be the case, that nobody can avail himself of the advantage of a railway except at particular points, does it not follow from that, that the landowner whose property is taken for such speculations has a greater claim to consideration on the ground of the large profits to be made by those speculators, than if those profits are likely to be small?—I may observe that the mode of computing for railways at fifty-eight years' purchase applies, because in the case of a railway there is no collateral advantage to be derived from it; whereas if it was a turnpike road going through the same estate, I should never consent to pay fifty-eight years' purchase for it, because I should say the advantage to the owner from the formation of the turnpike road would be such that he ought to give the land without any price; at least in some cases such a course might be deemed advisable.

Then you do not consider that the traversing of an agricultural estate by a railway, unless it happens to be in the immediate neighbourhood of a station, is advantageous to the land?—No, I do not think it is.

Then does not that form an argument in favour of the price to be paid to the landowner whose land is to be sacrificed, varying, to a certain degree, according to the profits which it is expected that the railway company may make?—I do not know that I have the means to answer that question, from having formed no opinion upon that subject. It does not appear to me that there ought to be any extra price given on that account, certainly.

Do you know any case where a person's residence has been injured, and the owner of that residence, not having any property actually on the line, has been compensated for the injury to his residence?—None; that principle has never been admitted at all.

Have you known any instances where considerable injury has been done in that way?—I do not think I have known any.

Mr. John Cramp, land valuer, Margate, Kent, examined:—

In cases where there are none of those peculiarities to which you have previously alluded in the situation of land, how have you proceeded in your valuations of the land where there has been a difference of opinion between the landowner and the company?—It has depended upon how the line passed through the estate, whether upon its margin, whether through its centre, or whether by separating a very large portion from the homestead, making the inconvenience of the portion severed either very great or very small. This has been the system upon which I have acted relative to compensation for damage and the value of the land. I have generally taken three points to fix myself to. The first is the fair value of the land in the neighbourhood, upon which I have usually put fifty per cent. in consideration of a compulsory sale.

Fifty per cent. in addition to the full value of the land?—In addition to what I should call the marketable value of the land.

What do you mean by the "fair value," in reference to the number of years' purchase?—That would be, taking the rental and giving it thirty years' purchase.

You mean the full rental?—The full rental.

Making the whole forty-five years?—Yes; supposing that the value of the land was 40s. per acre, of course I should call it worth 90l.

Are you able to strike an average of the amount of the severance?—The severance is exceedingly various, according to whether the line runs parallel or diagonally or across the estate, cutting the enclosures diagonally, and leaving triangular pieces on each side. I have then gone into calculations relative to the increased labour that must necessarily arise afterwards by the turn of the plough, and all the labour required in working the land that is thus severed. That I have arrived at by going practically into the cultivation. I find that the plough, by being obstructed in the turning, will lose forty yards in its straight direction every time; then, of course, in the same furrow on the other side there will be the same obstruction again; and that, upon a certain quantity of land for a certain length of railway, will amount to so much labour being lost in the ploughing, which ploughing I have given a certain value to, and upon that I have calculated thirty years' purchase. That is what I should call the damage arising to the future cultivation of the land by the increased labour and expense. The next point would be afterwards, when I was satisfied with respect to the value of the land, and the damage done by severance: I then take a general view of the estate, to see what its deterioration is by having that severance, and by having that obstruction across the farm. In some cases it is much; in other cases it is less, and upon that, having no tangible point whereon to calculate, it has been an operation of the judgment altogether, what I would give for it without the line, and what less I would give for it with the line. Those are three points that I generally fix myself to; and in doing so I have sometimes had some very strong battles to fight. Where the parties have left it to me I have generally succeeded; but usually the proprietor, as he advances towards a jury, begins to be a little nervous, and his solicitor has in several cases advised him by all means to compromise rather than go to a jury; for the decision of a jury is so uncertain, and often so contrary perhaps to sound evidence, that it deters many from going before a jury; and in several cases I am quite satisfied that many hundreds of pounds have been taken less than ought fairly to have been given for the property.

Upon any given length of railway, say five or ten miles, without going into the particulars, what do you think the compensation for severance has been per mile, upon the average?—A mile will take in a great variety of severances, because it will pass through three or four estates in a mile. I should say that the compensation for severance for land taken by the railway has been from 50*l.* per acre to 150*l.*

Should you put the average at 100*l.*?—No; not so much. I think the greater number have been confined to 50*l.* or 70*l.*; sometimes, where it has been very great, it has gone as far as 100*l.* or 150*l.*

Do you know many cases the other way, where individuals have been deprived of their land and have been forced to accept a certain amount of remuneration, and have then felt it, and have afterwards continued to feel it, a grievance?—Yes; on one farm in particular that happened, between Ashford and Folkestone. That was one of the cases in which I was engaged. The parties there, I believe, took about seven acres and a half of land, for which they paid 1,250*l.* The intrinsic marketable value of the land was somewhere about 60*l.* or 70*l.* an acre. This was also a compromise between the proprietor and the railway company, for my estimate went far beyond that. Since that, the occupier, who had a twenty-one years' lease at the time, has told me that if he could get rid of the railway he would willingly pay 100*l.* a year; that he found it a nuisance and interruption to the usual course of his operations in agriculture and grazing, because it went through both; and that he would willingly give 100*l.* a year more to be rid of the railway.

Do you consider that the noise, and other circumstances connected with the working of the railway, are injurious to the grazing of cattle in the fields?—No. I do not think there is much in that argument, unless it is horses or fresh cattle put upon the land; for a little while they are alarmed, but they soon become reconciled to it. I meant that it was inconvenient in shifting stock; for this railway went through the centre of the estate. He had grazing land on either side of it. He was confined to one communication, which was the bridge, through which he was obliged to drive his stock, and they became mixed; and he was obliged to have two or three people, where he had only one to open the gate before. Again, the arable land was cut off from the homestead, and his horses were often alarmed at the noise of the engines passing when they had just got upon the bridge, or near it; for he was obliged to pass this bridge to cultivate every acre of land upon his farm. In point of fact it is almost impossible to foresee all the inconvenience and all the damage that will be sustained, and that is the difficulty we have in arriving at the positive value that should be paid for compensation.

In this case was the bridge over or under the railway?—Over.

Do you really think that he sustained a loss or injury to the extent of 100*l.* a year?—I should say that you could not find it to be 100*l.* a year, by merely calculating the inconveniences, unless, perhaps, he kept a diary. If every day that he sent out three men instead of one, he had put it down, then at the year's end he would arrive at something like a tangible point on which to rest his damage; but he speaks in a general way, "I find so many inconveniences that I would willingly give 100*l.* a year for the railway to be taken away."

*Report,
and Evidence on
Compensation.*

2nd June, 1845.—The EARL FITZWILLIAM in the Chair.

Mr. John Swift, of Liverpool, Solicitor of the Grand Junction Railway Company, examined:—

Have you any knowledge of the terms on which the land generally has been purchased for the Grand Junction Railway Company?—I superintended the purchase of a considerable portion of it.

Can you state the total price that was paid for the land on the line?—I think altogether about 120,000*l.* for seventy-eight miles. That included station land at Birmingham.

Does that include the compensation for severance and damage, or merely land?—The whole.

What number of acres were taken?—About 800 acres, I should say, from recollection.

Could you, on any given length of ten or fifteen miles, where there were no remarkable circumstances either to make the price higher or lower, state what was the price?—I do not think there was any great difference between any districts, except of course where we approach a town. I do not know what the average may have been; perhaps 100*l.* an acre.

In a purely agricultural country it is about 100*l.* an acre?—Yes.

Have you any knowledge what, on an average, would have been the rent of that land?—I should think not 30*s.* an acre.

A good deal of it is very poor land, is it not?—Yes.

You think the average could be put as high as 30*s.* an acre?—I can only state that I think it would be to that amount.

You think it would be more than 25*s.* an acre in farming land, on the average, except of course near Liverpool?—We do not go near Liverpool; we begin at Warrington, and thence have only two miles in Lancashire, which is meadow land, and that lets for 4*l.* or 5*l.* an acre.

What did you pay for that land?—300*l.*, I think.

Including everything?—Yes; excluding, of course, communications.

Are you able to state the number of years' purchase upon the average that was given for the land between Newton and Birmingham?—No. If the rental was 30*s.* and the price 100*l.* per acre, it would be sixty-six years' purchase.

When you proposed compensation, did you take the letting value of the land, then the inconvenience in consequence of cutting diagonally through a field, and the inconvenience in ploughing, so much per cent. on the original letting, and then also for the additional severance so much per cent.? Do you assess it upon that calculation, or upon the gross estimate?—We had a valuation of that sort made, based on what the letting value was.

And then how much for severance?—If the landowner had not asked us more than double the value of the land we should have paid it without inquiry; if he asked six times as much, we should not; in the latter case we should have inquired into the two questions of land and of damage separately.

What has been your offer for land; more than thirty years' purchase?—Yes. If we had been called on to make an offer with the prospect of going to a jury, we should, for our own protection, have offered a price far beyond what they could have got from anybody.

You stated that you supposed it was about sixty-six years' purchase at the time you made those arrangements; what sort of arrangement would you have to make now; would it be more or less, do you think?—I have had occasion lately, as acting for the Lancaster and Carlisle Railway Company, to know what has been doing generally, and I should say that there they paid more years' purchase. There we have only had one jury case hitherto, and the jury gave less than the sum offered.

Has your valuer given you the value of the land itself, first, not taking into consideration the severance, but merely the value of the land?—He gives a statement of what he has ascertained to be the rent, and upon that he first assumes a certain number of years' purchase.

What is the number of years' purchase upon that?—I have stated the cases of which I was cognizant on the Grand Junction Railway; I could not reduce them respectively into years' purchase, taken generally.

That was not the average, I suppose?—Yes, including severance.

Without including severance?—Our surveyor always begins with thirty years' purchase or thirty-five years' purchase, and all the rest is damage. They put on a sum for what they call compulsory sale; five years' purchase, frequently.

Supposing there was a strip like that which is occupied by that which belongs to the railway company, running through the lands of these various proprietors, have you any doubt they would readily pay quite as large a number of years' purchase in order to secure that line as they have obtained from you?—Not always; but I think they would very often, or generally. If I had an estate I would not willingly have a piece taken out of the middle of it if I could prevent it.

You stated, as I understand you, that it was about thirty-three years' purchase that they got for the value of the land?—Yes; that is the beginning of the calculation, to ascertain what the landowner is ultimately to be paid.

As to the value of the land itself, without severance?—Yes, it would not matter how you work out the process.

You would decompose the demand of the landed proprietor, and see how much was the rental value, and how much you could afford to pay for severance?—If it were an unreasonable sum that he asked in gross, we should object, but not otherwise.

Do you think landowners could be put in a better position than they are by the bill that passed this session—the Lands Clauses Consolidating Bill?—I do not; because I think, with the option of a special jury on the one hand, or arbitration on the other, they really have, as it appears to me, every sort of protection you can conceive; and, generally speaking, I think that the reasonable prejudice of the jury is in favour of the landowners.

CHAPTER VI.

ON THE MODE OF ASSESSING COMPENSATION.

I. By Justices of the Peace . . . 278	III. By Arbitration 283
II. By Surveyors 282	IV. By a Jury 300

1. Compensation assessed by Justices of the Peace.

Compensation assessed by two justices.

8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, s. 22, App. 49.

8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 6, App. 75.

Sect. 30.

Sect. 43.

8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, s. 121, App. 67.

BY the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act it is enacted, that if no agreement be come to between the company and the owners of, or parties enabled to sell and convey or release, any lands taken or required for or injuriously affected by the execution of the undertaking, or any interest in such lands, as to the value of such lands, or of any interest therein, or as to the compensation to be made in respect thereof (a), and if in any such case the compensation claimed shall not exceed 50l., the same shall be settled by two justices (b). So, with respect to the construction of the railway and works, if any lands are taken or used or injuriously affected, the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act enacts, that if the sum in dispute does not exceed 50*l.*, the compensation is in like manner to be settled by two justices (c). And if the company enter upon any private road, and no agreement be made as to the amount of compensation which the owners and other persons interested in the road are to receive, the difference must be settled by two justices. Two justices may also, in certain cases, affix the amount of rent to be paid for the temporary use of lands.

So, where lands required to be taken by the company are in the possession of any person having no greater interest than as a tenant for a year, or from year to year (d), and such person is required to deliver up the lands before the expiration of their term, two justices are authorized by the Lands Clauses Act to assess the amount of compensation (e).

(a) The preliminary steps to be taken have been already considered, ante, 180.

(b) See also 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, s. 68, post, App. 55.

(c) See 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 6, post, App. 75; ibid. s. 16, post, App. 78. Ibid. s. 44, post, App. 83, taken in connection with 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, s. 22, supra.

(d) The schoolmaster of a free grammar-school who might be turned out by two-thirds of the governors and the bishop at three months' notice has no greater interest than this; and must proceed before the justices, though he claim much more than 50*l.* compensation. R. v. Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire R. Co., 4 E. & B. 88. A person who produces a lease which is void at law but good in equity is not to be considered a yearly tenant. Sweetman v. Metropolitan R. Co., 1 Hemm. & Mill. 543.

(e) Their order need not be in writing. R. v. Coombe, 32 L. J. (M. C.) 67.

In both the last-mentioned cases, the jurisdiction of the justices seems to attach, although the amount of compensation in dispute may exceed 50*l*.

*Compensation assessed by Two

Where, therefore, lands in the possession of a person having no greater interest than as tenant for a year, or from year to year, are taken by a railway company, the tenant must proceed to obtain compensation before justices and cannot proceed under sect. 68 (f).

It has, however, been held that where possession of the lands is not required by the company, a tenant from year to year who is "injuriously affected" cannot proceed under sect. 121, but must proceed under sect. 68 (g). To obviate the inconvenience and expense attendant upon such proceedings in the case of tenants from year to year of small houses in the neighbourhood of London, the Metropolitan R. Co. procured the insertion in their act of 1863 of the clause to which we have already adverted (h), and which was incorporated in their acts of 1864 (i), under which all claims for compensation, under the acts relating to the Metropolitan Railway by persons who have no greater interest than as tenant for a year, or from year to year, must be made in manner provided by sect. 121. And there are similar provisions in many other Railway Acts passed in 1864 (k). If, in a case under sect. 121, the company agree to refer a claim to arbitration, and join in appointing an arbitrator, they cannot afterwards object that the claimant ought to have proceeded before justices under sect. 121 (l).

the Metropolis.*

*Agreement to
sect. 121.*

Two justices are also empowered to apportion the amount of rents payable in respect of copyhold lands, when only part of the lands are required to be taken for the purposes of the Railway: (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, s. 98, post, App. 63.) And they may, under the like circumstances, apportion the amount of rent-charges, &c.: (Sect. 116.)

rents.
Copyholds.*

Rent-charges.

So, if lands are comprised in a lease for years unexpired, and a part only of such lands are required by the company, the rent of the remaining portion of the land is to be apportioned by agreement, or by two justices; and, after such apportionment, the lessee is liable only for the rent apportioned: (Sect. 119.) Two justices are also empowered to assess compensation under 50*l.* for lands omitted to be purchased by mistake: (Sects. 124, 125, 126.)

In order to give the justices jurisdiction, they must be acting justices for the county or city, &c. where the matter requiring their cognizance arises, and not be interested (n) in the matter; and if the question arises in respect of lands situate not wholly in any one county or city, &c., justices for the county or city, &c. where any part of the lands are situate may act; and, in all cases, the two justices must be assembled and acting together (o): (Sect. 3.)

The following is the mode of proceeding directed in all cases of disputed compensation authorized to be settled by two justices:—

By sect. 24, “it shall be lawful for any justice, upon the application of either party, with respect to any question of disputed compensation by this or the special act, or any act incorporated therewith, authorized to be settled by two justices (p), to summon the other party to appear before two justices, at a time and place to be named in the summons, and upon the appearance of such parties, or in the absence of any of them, upon proof of due service of the summons, it shall be lawful for such justices to hear and determine such question, and for that purpose to examine such parties or any of them, and their witnesses, upon oath, and the costs of every such inquiry shall be in the discretion of such justices, and they shall settle the amount thereof.

It is conceived, that the justices cannot, any more than a jury (q), inquire into the claimant’s right to compensation; they are merely to award the amount, and leave the question of right to be decided when proceedings are taken to enforce their award.

The justices, in estimating the purchase-money or compensation, are required to regard, not only the value of the land to be purchased, but also the damage, if any, which may be sustained by reason of the severing of the lands taken from other lands of the owner:

(o) Also 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 3, post, App. 74.

(p) It will be observed that this section applies only to questions of disputed compensation. Some of the cases above enumerated, over which justices have jurisdiction—for instance, those relating to the apportionment of rents—do not seem to be cases of disputed compensation, within the meaning of the section. But if this be so, the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 142, seems to apply. By that section, “where in this act any question of compensation, expenses, charges, or damages, or other matter, is referred to the determination of any one justice or more, it shall be lawful for any justice, upon the application of either party, to summon the other party to appear before one justice, or before two justices, as the case may require, at a time and place to be named in such summons; and upon the appearance of such parties, or in the absence of any of them, upon proof of due service of the summons, it shall be lawful for such one justice, or such two justices, as the case may be, to hear and determine such question, and for that purpose to examine such parties, or any of them, and their witnesses, on oath; and the cost of every such inquiry shall be in the discretion of such justices, and they shall determine the amount thereof.”

(q) See on this point, post, 303.

(Sect. 63)(r). And where the time for executing the works has been extended by the Board of Trade, they must also take into consideration any additional damage caused by such extension of time (s).

Compensation assessed by Two Justices.

The proper mode of enforcing payment of money awarded by justices, for compensation under the above powers, is by obtaining an order from the justices for the payment of the money, which may be enforced by a distress (t). The decision of the justices is conclusive, provided the matter determined be within their jurisdiction. But although the certiorari is taken away (u), an order may be brought up to be quashed, if the justices had no jurisdiction to make it (x). It has been decided (y), that the statute 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43 (z), applies to orders made by justices for the payment of compensation, under the Consolidation Acts. It is, therefore, necessary to observe, that by sect. 11 of that statute, "in all cases where no time is already or shall hereafter be specially limited for making any complaint or laying any information in the act or acts of Parliament relating to each particular case, such complaint shall be made, and such information shall be laid, within six calendar months from the time when the matter of such complaint or information respectively arose" (a).

The mode of enforcing payment is by obtaining an order.

Order may be quashed if made without jurisdiction.

Claims must be made within six months, under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43.

In the case above referred to, an order for compensation was made by justices in 1850, in respect of damage done by the execution of railway works in 1847, and the order, being brought up by certiorari, was quashed for the reason before mentioned. It follows, therefore, that in all cases claims for compensation in respect of damages done to lands must be made before the justices, within six calendar months from the time when the injury is sustained.

Two justices are also authorized to determine differences as to the kind or number of accommodation works, and the repairing thereof (b), and as to deviations (c); also to hear objections to the taking of lands (d), and to appoint surveyors in certain cases (e); but their

Cases where compensation may be assessed by surveyors.

8 & 9 Vict. c. 18,
s. 47, App. 53.

Compensation may be assessed by surveyors in the following cases:—If a party, who has received due notice, fails to appear at the inquiry held before the jury; or if, by reason of absence from the kingdom, he be prevented from treating, or if any party cannot, after diligent inquiry, be found (Sect. 58), then two justices are required to nominate an able practical surveyor (f), to determine the purchase-money or compensation to be paid for any lands to be purchased or taken by the company, and the compensation for any permanent injury to such lands; and such surveyor is directed to annex to his valuation, a declaration in writing of the correctness thereof (g): (Sect. 59.) Every surveyor is required to make a declaration that he will act faithfully and honestly: (Sect. 60.) The nomination and declaration must be annexed to the valuation and preserved therewith, by the company, and be open to inspection: (Sect. 61.) And all the expenses incident to every such valuation must be borne by the company: (Sect. 62.) In all cases where the compensation has been thus ascertained by a surveyor, by reason that the party could not be found, or was absent from the kingdom, such party, if dissatisfied, may, before he shall have applied to the Court of Chancery for the money deposited in the Bank, require the question of compensation to be submitted to arbitration, as in other cases of disputed compensation (h): (Sects. 64, 65.) If a further sum be awarded, the company are required to pay, or deposit the same, and provisions are made as to the costs incident to the arbitration: (Sects. 66, 67.) And we have seen that where lands are purchased or taken from parties under disability to convey, &c., the compensation (except where it has been assessed by a jury, or by arbitration, or by the valuation of a surveyor appointed by two justices) must be assessed by two able practical surveyors, to be appointed as directed by the act (i).

Surveyors, in estimating the compensation, are required to observe the rule already referred to (ante, 280), as to regarding the damages sustained by the severance of the lands taken, from other lands of the owner: (Sect. 63.)

(f) It seems to be improper to appoint a surveyor who has been previously engaged on behalf of the company, ante, 189, note (s).

(g) It does not seem to be necessary that the appointment should contain a description of the lands. Poynder v. Great Northern R. Co., 5 Railw. C. 200; see the form, post, App. tit. Forms.

(i) Ante, 172. See 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, s. 9, post, App. 47.

And, when common or waste lands are taken for the purposes of a railway act, the commoners are required to appoint a committee to negotiate with the company (k); but if no such committee be appointed, then two justices are required to appoint a surveyor, who is thereupon authorized to determine the amount of compensation which the commoners are entitled to receive for the extinction of their commonable rights: (Sect. 106.)

By Surveyors.

We have already stated (l) that under sect. 85 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, a surveyor may also be appointed, in certain cases, to make a valuation of lands; but as this is a proceeding merely preliminary to the entry on the lands, it is unnecessary to refer further to this subject in this place.

III.—By Arbitration.

The provisions whereby parties are enabled to refer their claims for compensation, in respect of injuries done to lands, to arbitration, are contained in a few sections of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, and as these important clauses have been made the subject of discussion in the Courts, we proceed to transcribe them without abbreviation, and then, by adding a few remarks on the effect of the decisions, as they apply to these clauses, we propose to present a short summary of the law on this subject.

Arbitration clauses in the Lands Clauses Act.
8 & 9 Vict. c. 18.

We have already shown that, by sect. 23, any party claiming compensation, whose claim exceeds 50*l.*, has the option to have the same settled by arbitration, provided he signifies his desire to the company in due time (m). Sect. 23 concludes thus:—"but unless the party claiming compensation shall as aforesaid signify his desire to have the question of such compensation settled by arbitration, or if, when the matter shall have been referred to arbitration, the arbitrators or their umpire shall for three months have failed to make their or his award, or if no final award shall be made, the question of such compensation shall be settled by the verdict of a jury, as hereinafter provided" (n).

If award be not made in three months, the case must go to a jury, sect. 23.

By sect. 25, when any question of disputed compensation by this or the special act, or any act incorporated therewith, authorized or required to be settled by arbitration, shall have arisen, then, unless both parties shall concur in the appointment of a single arbitrator, each party, on the request of the other party, shall nominate and appoint an arbitrator (p), to whom such dispute shall be referred; and every appointment of an arbitrator shall be made on the part of the promoters of the undertaking (q), under the hands of the said promoters or any two of them, or of their secretary or clerk (r), and on the part of any other party under the hand of such party, or if such party be a corporation aggregate, under the common seal of such corporation; and such appointment shall be delivered to the arbitrator, and shall be deemed a submission to arbitration on the part of the party by whom the same shall be made; and after any such appointment shall have been made, neither party shall have power to revoke the same without the consent of the other, nor shall the death of either party operate as a revocation; and if for the space of fourteen days after any such dispute shall have arisen, and after a request in writing, in which shall be stated the matter so required to be referred to arbitration, shall have been served by the one party on the other party, to appoint an arbitrator, such last-mentioned party fail to appoint such arbitrator, then upon such failure the party making the request, and having himself appointed an arbitrator, may appoint such arbitrator to act on behalf of both parties, and such arbitrator may proceed to hear and determine the matters which shall be in dispute (s), and in such case the award or determination of such single arbitrator shall be final.

Yates v. Mayor of Blackburn.

Where the amount claimed for compensation is not paid or agreed to be paid within twenty-one days, as provided by sect. 68, it is the duty of the claimant, before nominating an arbitrator on his behalf, to attempt to procure the appointment of a single arbitrator (t).

(p) If either party objects to the arbitrator appointed by the other side, on the ground that he is not an impartial person, it is not sufficient to protest against the propriety of the appointment, but it seems that it is the duty of the objecting party to retire from the arbitration. Thus, where the objection was, that a railway company had appointed as their arbitrator a surveyor who had been employed by them in the first instance, to negotiate for the purchase of the land, the value of which was in dispute, K. Bruce, V. C., said—that the surveyor ought not to have been selected, but that the claimants had waived the objection, by going on with the arbitration, although under protest. In re Elliott, 2 De G. & Sm. 17.

(q) By the corresponding clause in the Railways Clauses Act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 126, the appointment of an arbitrator on the part of the company may be made “under the hand of the secretary or any two of the directors of the company.”

(r) Where a claimant agreed with a railway company to refer a question of compensation, and the agreement was signed on behalf of the company by their secretary, it cannot be objected that the signature of the secretary did not bind the company; because the 25th section, which authorizes the company to refer by a submission signed by the secretary, applies to all cases of arbitration, whether compulsory or otherwise. Collins v. South Staffordshire R. Co., 21 L. J. (Exch.) 247; 7 Exch. 5.

(s) The amount to be paid in money is the one question in dispute. The arbitrator can award nothing but money, and not rights of ways or approaches. Re Ware, 9 Exch. 395; Re Byles, 11 Exch. 464; Re Duke of Beaufort, 29 L. J. (C. P.) 241.

(t) Yates v. Mayor of Blackburn, 29 L. J. (Exch.) 447.

It will be observed that sect. 25 requires that each party, on the request of the other party, shall "nominate and appoint" an arbitrator. It is, therefore, important to ascertain what is a valid nomination and appointment of an arbitrator, within the meaning of this and other sections in the Consolidation Acts. It seems that no such nomination and appointment can be said to be made until the appointment is actually made and delivered to the arbitrator (u), and notice of such nomination and appointment given to the other side. The following decision seems to afford a rule of construction on this point. By the terms of an agreement, the defendant agreed to purchase growing crops of the plaintiff, the price to be paid on the 5th of June, the valuation to be made by the 3rd of June, by two persons, one named by each party by the 31st of May; and in case either party neglected or refused to nominate a referee within the time appointed, the referee of the other party alone was to make a final decision. The defendant having neglected to appoint a valuer, the plaintiff's valuer proceeded ex parte, and the plaintiff sued the defendant for the money awarded. The defendant pleaded that the plaintiff did not within the time appointed, or according to the agreement, "nominate or appoint" a referee. It was decided that the word "nominate," as used in the agreement, meant not only the choice of a referee, but the communication of the appointment to the other party; and that an appointment by the plaintiff of a referee, on the 31st of May, and communication of that appointment to the defendant (who resided in another county) by letter, which reached him on the 1st of June, did not entitle the plaintiff to proceed ex parte within the meaning of the agreement (x).

And there should be, not only an actual appointment and a notification of such appointment to the other side, but the notice of the appointment must be express in its terms. Thus, where the notice sent by a claimant to a railway company was, "Take notice, that it is my intention to nominate and appoint S. M. as my arbitrator," it was held to be insufficient, although the claimant proceeded to say in the notice, that if the company failed to nominate an arbitrator, "I, the said T. B. (the claimant), will appoint the said S. M. to act on behalf of both parties" (y).

Before an arbitrator can act on behalf of both parties upon the appointment of the claimant, it seems that there must be two appointments. The claimant should appoint an arbitrator on his behalf, and then, after notification of such appointment and request in writing, if the other party fails for the space of fourteen days to appoint an arbitrator on his behalf, the claimant may appoint one to act for both. The ground for requiring an actual appointment of an arbitrator by the claimant is, that the other party may consider whether he will acquiesce in that appointment (a).

Vacancy of arbitrator to be supplied.

8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, s. 26, App. 50.

The statute then enacts, that if, before the matters so referred shall be determined, any arbitrator appointed by either party die or become incapable, the party by whom such arbitrator was appointed may nominate and appoint in writing some other person to act in his place, and if, for the space of seven days after notice in writing from the other party for that purpose, he fail to do so, the remaining or other arbitrator may proceed ex parte; and every arbitrator so to be substituted as aforesaid shall have the same powers and authorities as were vested in the former arbitrator at the time of such his death or disability as aforesaid.

Appointment of umpire, sect. 27.

Where more than one arbitrator shall have been appointed, such arbitrators shall, before they enter upon the matters referred to them, nominate and appoint, by writing under their hands, an umpire (b), to decide on any such matters on which they shall differ, or which shall be referred to him under the provisions of this or the special act; and if such umpire shall die, or become incapable to act, they shall forthwith, after such death or incapacity, appoint another umpire in his place, and the decision of every such umpire on the matters so referred to him shall be final (c).

Board of Trade may appoint an umpire, sect. 28.

If, in either of the cases aforesaid, the said arbitrators shall refuse, or shall, for seven days after request of either party to such arbitration, neglect to appoint an umpire, the Board of Trade (d), in any case in which a railway company shall be one party to the arbitration, and two justices in any other case, shall, on the application of either party to such arbitration, appoint an umpire, and the decision of such umpire, on the matters on which the arbitrators shall differ, or which shall be referred to him under this or the special act, shall be final (e).

(a) 5 Exch. 773.

(b) The umpire should be a perfectly disinterested person. Where the arbitrators appointed as umpire a surveyor who had been employed professionally by a railway company, in which he was also a shareholder, whose interests were intimately connected with the company disputing the compensation, which was the subject of the reference, K. Bruce, V. C., said—"I am not clear that he ought to have been appointed an umpire, in point of delicacy. I should, however, be going too far to set aside the award on this ground. There are some things in this case which it would have been better had they been otherwise, but I think that there are no judicial grounds on which to set aside the award. It is saved very narrowly, in my judgment." Re Elliott, 2

In Wilts, Somerset and Weymouth R. Co. v. Fooks, 3 Exch. 728, an objection was taken to an appointment of an umpire, on the ground that it was not so made; but the objection was considered too doubtful to be decided on a motion to set aside the award. The jurisdiction of the Board of Trade is treated of, post, Ch. IX.

(e) 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, s. 28, post, App. 50.

If, when a single arbitrator shall have been appointed, such arbitrator shall die or become incapable to act before he shall have made his award, the matters referred to him shall be determined by arbitration, under the provisions of this or the special act, in the same manner as if such arbitrator had not been appointed.

8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, s. 29, App. 50.

If, where more than one arbitrator shall have been appointed, either of the arbitrators refuse, or for seven days neglect to act (f), the other arbitrator may proceed ex parte, and the decision of such other arbitrator shall be as effectual as if he had been the single arbitrator appointed by both parties (g).

In case of refusal or neglect to act, sect. 30.

If, where more than one arbitrator shall have been appointed, and where neither of them shall refuse or neglect to act as aforesaid, such arbitrators shall fail to make their award within twenty-one days after the day on which the last of such arbitrators shall have been appointed, or within such extended time (if any) as shall have been appointed for that purpose by both such arbitrators under their hands, the matters referred to them shall be determined by the umpire to be appointed as aforesaid (h).

If no award be made in twenty-one days, then umpire to act, sect. 31.

The said arbitrators or their umpire may call for the production of any documents in the possession or power of either party, which they or he may think necessary for determining the question in dispute, and may examine the parties or their witnesses on oath, and administer the oaths necessary for that purpose (i).

All the costs of such arbitration, and incident thereto, to be settled by the arbitrators, shall be borne by the company, unless the arbitrators shall award the same or a less sum than shall have been offered by the company, in which case each party shall bear his own costs incident to the arbitration, and the costs of the arbitrators shall be borne by the parties in equal proportions (o).

Where an award was made ex parte, by reason of the default of the company to appear before the arbitrator, a mandamus was granted to compel the company to take up the award, although it was endeavoured to be shown as cause against granting the writ, that the affidavits did not show that the lands had been injuriously affected; that the claimant also had not stated in his notice, given under sect. 23 of the act, what was the extent of his interest in the land, and had also in his notice required payment of the sum demanded within seven days, instead of twenty-one days as provided by sect. 68. *R. v. (q) This provision rests upon the stat. 9 & 10 Will. 3, c. 15, which enacts, "that all merchants and others, who desire to end any controversy, suit or quarrel (for which there is no other remedy but by personal action or suit in equity), may agree that their submission of the action or suit to arbitration or umpirage shall be made a rule of any of the king's courts of record, and may insert such agreement in their submission or promise, or condition of the arbitration bond: which agreement being proved upon oath by one of the witnesses thereto, the court shall make a rule that such submission and award shall be conclusive; and, after such rule made, the parties disobeying the award shall be liable to be punished as for a contempt of the court, unless such award shall be set aside for corruption, or undue means used in its procurement, or other misbehaviour in the arbitrators or umpire, proved on oath to the court, within one term after the award is made. And by 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, ss. 39-41, submissions to reference, containing an agreement that such submission may be made a rule of court, shall not be revocable except by leave of the court or a judge; and the court or any judge thereof may from time to time enlarge the term for making the award; and it shall be lawful for the court or any judge to command the attendance of witnesses or the production of documents, and disobedience shall be deemed a contempt of court; and persons wilfully and corruptly giving any false evidence shall be guilty of perjury. A submission may be made a rule of court in vacation as well as in term. Re Taylor, 5 B. & A. 217. It has been ruled that, under this section, the submission to arbitration may be made a rule of court, in Chancery, and an order nisi may be afterwards obtained to set aside the award, without giving notice to the other party. Re Elliott, 2 De G.

No award made with respect to any question referred to arbitration can be set aside for irregularity or error in matter of form (s). By Arbitration.

Arbitrators, in estimating the purchase-money or compensation, are required to regard not only the value of the land to be purchased, but also the damage to be sustained, by reason of the severing of the lands taken, from other lands of the owner (t). Award not to be set aside for form.

There are also cases where the exclusive jurisdiction to decide on disputed compensation is vested in arbitrators (u). Thus, in all cases where the compensation has been ascertained by a surveyor, by reason that the party could not be found, or was absent from the kingdom, such party, if dissatisfied, may, before he shall have applied to the Court of Chancery for the money deposited in the Bank, require the question of compensation to be submitted to arbitration, as in other cases of disputed compensation (Sects. 64, 65); and if a further sum Other cases where the arbitration clauses are applicable.

In that case the rule directed that "the two several appointments of arbitrators, or submissions to arbitration, executed by the parties respectively, should be respectively entered and made a rule of this court," and this was held sufficient. Where claimants who had made an appointment of an arbitrator under sect. 25, refused to produce it, for the purpose of enabling the registrar to draw up an order which had been obtained by the company, making the submission a rule of court, the court refused a motion on behalf of the company, that the order might be drawn up, or that the landowners might produce the appointment; but there being in the affidavits of the landowners, in opposition to the motion, a statement that their arbitrator had been duly appointed, and also a recital to the same effect in an appointment of an umpire, the court, on a subsequent motion, ordered the submission to be made a rule of court. Hawley v. North Staffordshire R. Co., 2 De G. & Sm. 33. It has been laid down, that statements laid before the arbitrator, or submission, which did not contain consent that the admission might be made a rule of court, could not be made so. Re Ware, 9 Exch. 400; *Dawson v. (s) It is difficult to lay down any general rules as to the distinction between matters of form and matters of substance. It may be useful, however, on this point, to refer to the decisions on 5 Geo. 2, c. 19, which empowered justices on appeal to amend "defects of form" in judgments or orders. See *R. v. (u) The Companies and Railways Clauses Consolidation Acts contain a series of clauses relative to the settlement of disputes by arbitration, nearly similar to those we have above transcribed, but there are some variations in respect to costs and other matters which will make it important to consider, in some cases, under which act an arbitration is proceeding. See 8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, ss. 128—134, post, App. 40, and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, ss. 126—137, post, App. 96.

is awarded, the company are required to pay the same: (Sect. 66.) In such cases, all the costs incident to the arbitration are borne by the company; but if no further sum be awarded, such costs are in the discretion of the arbitrators: (Sect. 67.) And if persons are entitled to a right of pre-emption of superfluous lands, and no agreement can be made between such persons with the company as to the price, then the price must be ascertained by arbitration; and the costs of the arbitration in such cases are in the discretion of the arbitrators: (Sect. 130.)

8 & 9 Vict. c. 20,
s. 81.

So, in all cases where the company are required, from time to time, to make compensation to the owners of mines lying on both sides of a railway, for all such losses and expenses as are particularly mentioned in the statute, any dispute as to the amount of compensation in respect of such losses and expenses must be settled by arbitration.

It belongs rather to a treatise on the Law of Arbitration to discuss, in any detail, the numerous questions which may arise on the subject now under consideration, and we therefore content ourselves with making a few remarks on some leading points, which relate to the construction of the foregoing arbitration clauses in the Consolidation Acts.

What is a dispute to be settled by arbitration.

But, first, it may be observed, that it is clear that when a claimant says he is damaged, and therefore entitled to compensation, but the railway company contend that there is no damage, and therefore no compensation, this is a dispute as to the amount of compensation to be settled by arbitration. If the arbitrator finds the damage nominal, or infinitesimally small, he may find that the amount of compensation is nil (x). And if upon a reference to an arbitrator as to the price to be paid for land and severance damage, his award is silent as to severance damage, it is nevertheless good (y).

With respect to the time within which the award should be made.

Within what time an award should be made.

8 & 9 Vict. c. 18,
s. 31, App. 51.

It appears, by sect. 31, that the arbitrators must make their award within twenty-one days after the appointment of the last arbitrator, or within such extended time as shall have been appointed for that purpose. But the arbitrators cannot enlarge the time beyond three months in the whole, because section 23 requires the award to be made within that period (z). The umpire may, however, be appointed at any period within the above-named three months, although the arbitrators have failed to make their award at the expiration of the twenty-one days, and have also failed to extend the time. In re Bradshaw (a) is a leading case on this subject. There the company appointed their arbitrator on the 23rd March, and the claimant his on the 6th April. These arbitrators did not appoint an umpire, or enter on the matters referred; and both parties, before the 29th April, joined in applying to the Board of Trade to appoint an umpire. On 29th April the claimant objected to the appointment of any umpire, not a barrister. The company afterwards made a request to the arbitrators; and, after seven days, another application to the Board of Trade, who, on 17th May, appointed a surveyor to be umpire. He made his declaration on 27th May, and his award on 26th July. Upon these facts the objections were, that the appointment of an umpire must be completed within twenty-one days, and the award of the umpire be made within three months after the appointment of the arbitrators; that their appointment was complete on 6th April, and that, consequently, the appointment of the umpire on 17th May, and the making of the award on 26th July, were too late. But Lord Denman, C. J., said:—

“The powers given for arbitration continue for three months after the arbitrators are appointed, and are determined then only by sect. 23, enacting that the question shall be settled by a jury if, when the matter shall have been referred to arbitration, the arbitrators or their umpire shall for three months have failed to make their or his award, or if no final award shall be made. Then the 31st section, providing that the umpire shall determine where neither of the arbitrators refuses or neglects to act, and they fail for twenty-one days from their appointment to make their award, operates only to take from the arbitrators the power of making an award, and to vest that power in the umpire, but not to render void the submission to arbitration, and the other powers incidental thereto, such as the appointment of an umpire. The statute contemplates three cases where a single arbitrator is to award, and in each of those cases he has three months for the purpose; viz. where a single arbitrator is originally appointed under sect. 25, or a vacancy is left unsupplied under sect. 26, or one of the two refuses or neglects to act under sect. 30. It is to be observed, that the umpire cannot be brought into action in either of these cases. Then sect. 31 provides for two arbitrators acting and failing to award. If they so fail for twenty-one days, and do not extend their time, the power to award is taken from them, and vested in such umpire as is duly appointed under the other provisions of the statute, which are not affected by this section. The incapacity to make an award has no effect upon the power given to the arbitrators under sect. 27, and to the Board of Trade, on their default, under sect. 28, to appoint a new umpire, in case of the death or failure of the first. And we see no reason why the same incapacity to award should have any effect upon the powers given for appointing the original umpire. If the construction contended for by the claimant is correct, it might happen that at the end of twenty-one days, the power to award might cease, and the power to resort to a jury still be suspended for the residue of three months, which would be a delay without purpose. On these grounds we have come to the conclusion that the appointment of the umpire was valid."

It is also important to notice, that in cases where an umpire has been appointed, the three months allowed him for making the award is to be calculated from the period when the duty of making the award first devolved upon him (a). This was decided by Lord Cottenham, C., who said that, under sect. 31, the arbitrators have twenty-one days, in the first instance, to make their award, or they may enlarge the time for themselves; not, however, beyond the three months mentioned in sect. 23, and whenever it happened either at the expiration of the twenty-one days, or the expiration of the enlarged time, that the duty of the umpire commenced, then the umpire had three months allowed him to perform his duty. And in Bradshaw's case (b), Lord Denman, C. J., adopting Lord Cottenham's decision, said:—

"The remaining objection is, that the award of the umpire is too late, there being more than three months between the appointment of the arbitrators and his award. But we find it decided, in Skerratt v. North Staffordshire R. Co., that the three months for the umpire commences from the duty devolving upon him. In this decision we fully concur; and as this award of the umpire was made within three months from the duty devolving upon him, and indeed within three months from his appointment, it is not too late."

And it has been recently decided that where by consent the time is enlarged beyond the three months the Court will not set aside the award (c). The arbitration clauses being introduced for the benefit of the parties, they are at liberty to renounce at their pleasure the advantages which those clauses afford (d).

If the arbitration fails altogether, the claimant need not commence proceedings de novo.

Where arbitrators had been regularly appointed to decide a claim for purchase-money and compensation, but they made no award, and the Board of Trade refused to appoint an umpire, because more than three months had elapsed since the appointment of the arbitrators, Wightman, J., decided the claimant was not bound to begin de novo, under sect. 68, but that the case fell under sect. 23, and that on the refusal of the company to submit the question of compensation to a jury, the claimant was entitled to a mandamus to compel the company to issue a warrant to the sheriff (e).

Costs.

Some cases must also be noticed upon the subject of the costs of arbitrations, under the Lands Clauses Act. These are provided for, as we have seen, by sect. 34 (f).

It seems that under sect. 34, if the company do not offer any sum, and there is a compulsory arbitration under the statute, the claimant ought to have his costs, as the statute provides that all the costs shall be borne by the company, unless the arbitrators shall award the same or less than has been offered by the company (g). In a case in which a claimant, the amount claimed under sect. 68 not being paid within twenty-one days, without attempting to procure the appointment of a single arbitrator, immediately nominated an arbitrator on his behalf, but omitted to deliver the nomination to such arbitrator, and the promoters subsequently and before nominating their arbitrators tendered a sum for damages and costs, which was refused, and exceeded the amount afterwards awarded by the umpire: it was held, that the claimant was not entitled to the costs of the arbitration, but the Court declined to lay down any rule as to the time within which a tender must be made to relieve the party making it from costs under sect. 34 (h).

Where a landowner claimed compensation, first, in respect of the value of his land; and secondly, in respect of damage done to other lands held therewith, and the matter was referred to an arbitrator, under sect. 23, and the company made no previous offer of any sum in respect of either claim, and the arbitrator awarded a sum of money for the value of the land, but found that the claimant had no claim to compensation in respect of the damage to his other lands, it was contended that the claimant was entitled, under the 34th section, to all the costs of and incident to the arbitration, just as if one claim only had been made and allowed; but the Court of Queen's Bench decided that the arbitrator was not bound to allow the claimant the whole of his costs, but that he might leave each party to bear his own costs incident to the claim which was disallowed. The Court was also of opinion that if a single claim were made and wholly disallowed, the claimant would not be entitled to any costs, although the company should not have made any previous offer in respect of the alleged damage (i).

who succeeded in obtaining compensation before a jury "should be entitled to recover the costs and expenses of such notice, precept and of summoning and returning such jury and witnesses, and also of the inquest; it was held, that this included charges for the attornies' attendance, and for briefs, witnesses, and the like, but not the expenses incurred by surveyors in valuing the premises; if witnesses, surveyors would be on the same footing as others (l). But where in a similar case the statute directed that a party should be entitled to receive all the costs of summoning such jury, and the expenses of witnesses, it was held, that the party was not entitled to the general costs of the inquiry (m).

should find amount of costs.

London and North-Western
R. Co. v. Quick.

A question has been raised whether, under sect. 34, the arbitrator or umpire ought to find and state in his award the amount of costs to be paid, or whether a supplementary certificate or award may be subsequently made. The decisions are not uniform on this point, but the practice seems to be, to give a separate certificate for costs. In L. and N. W. R. Co. v. Quick (n), Erle, J., in discharging a rule which had been obtained to enforce the payment of costs pursuant to an award, expressed an opinion that sect. 34 imposed on the arbitrators or umpire the duty of ascertaining whether the right to the costs arose, and of including it in their award, when it existed; that it appeared to him to be the intention of the legislature that the right to costs, and on the part of the claimant the amount of them, should be settled in the same way and by the same instrument as the costs of the arbitrator. That learned judge also observed, that this construction was confirmed by the consideration that the remedy for obtaining payment of costs included in the award was easy, while the process of obtaining a certificate of settlement of costs, from persons who were arbitrators, but who were not to decide whether they were due, and of applying for a rule on affidavits of essential facts, was, at all events, complex and anomalous, and, in his opinion, not legal.

Gould v. Staffordshire Potteries
Waterworks Co.

When the same question was first discussed in the Court of Exchequer, upon a motion to set aside an award which did not settle the amount of costs, the judges expressed considerable doubt as to the construction of the statute (o); and in a subsequent case (p), upon a demurrer to a declaration, that Court distinguished the case of L. and N. W. R. Co. v. Quick, from which, however, they expressed dissent, and held that the finding as to the costs of the claimants need not be incorporated in the award, but may be assessed by a subsequent instrument under the hand of the party who made the award. By Arbitration.

 Lord Wensleydale observed:—

“The sole question is, whether, looking at the several clauses of this statute, the legislature meant that all to be done by the arbitrator or umpire was to be included in a single award or umpirage, which he was empowered to make; and I think it quite clear that the legislature did not intend every matter of dispute to be comprised in a single award. By the 23rd section, the only matter referred to the arbitrators is the compensation to be paid for the lands required to be taken for the purposes of the undertaking; all they have to do is to ascertain the amount that ought to be so paid. Then we come to the 34th section, which directs that all the costs of any arbitration are to be borne by the promoters of the undertaking, unless the arbitrators award the same or a less sum than shall have been offered by the promoters of the undertaking, in which case each party shall bear his own costs incident to the arbitration, and those of the arbitrators shall be borne by the parties in equal proportions; so that the necessity for making the taxation of costs depends entirely on the result of the award, whether a larger sum has been awarded than was offered by the promoters of the undertaking. Now the arbitrators or umpire have no power, in the first instance, to inquire into the costs, or anything beyond the compensation to be made; they are to determine each of the questions separately, the intention of the legislature being, that so soon as it becomes necessary that the costs of the arbitration should be determined by the arbitrators, they shall have the power to tax them by an instrument other than the award.”

Gould v. Staffordshire Potteries Waterworks Co.

The result appears to be, that the award need only show the amount of the compensation, and that it need not appear therein whether the claimant is entitled to costs, by reason of the arbitrators having awarded a larger sum than the company had previously offered. And further, that the adjudication of costs may be made after the expiration of the period limited for making the award (q). It has also been ruled that an umpire has power over the costs when he makes the award: and that the word “arbitrators” in sect. 34 includes an umpire, who is therefore the proper person to settle the amount of the costs (r).

Costs may be given after the expiration of the three months. The umpire has jurisdiction over costs.

The best, if not the only, way of recovering the costs is by action (s).

It is not necessary to detail with minuteness the practice which prevails in conducting an arbitration. It may be observed, generally, that arbitrators have the most extensive discretion as to the

The manner in which an arbitration should be conducted.

(q) See Martin v. Leicester Waterworks Co., 27 L. J. (Exch.) 432, where an arbitrator, appointed by an agreement which incorporated sect. 34, having awarded compensation, afterwards, by a separate writing, settled the costs, and the claimant recovered them in an action. See also Collins v. South Staffordshire R. Co., 7 Exch. 5; Yates v. Mayor of Blackburn, 29 L. J. (Exch.) 447, similar actions. See also Holdsworth v. Barsham, 31 L. J. (Q. B.) 145.

Williams*, 3 Exch. 93, where the word arbitrators, in a judge's order, was held to include, by that description, the umpire who had made the award. It is to be observed, that by sect. 31 “the matters” by the statute referred to arbitrators are to be determined by the umpire, which seems clearly to show that he has power over the costs.

mode of conducting the inquiry before them (t); and as laymen are frequently selected to be arbitrators and umpires, there cannot be any doubt that they are entitled to avail themselves of professional assistance in conducting the inquiry and preparing the award (u). The evidence should always be taken in the presence of the parties or their agents (x); but it seems that an umpire may communicate privately with the arbitrators (y).

Where one of two arbitrators was absent at a meeting, and, notwithstanding a protest from the parties who had appointed him, the other arbitrator, together with the umpire, whose powers to act had not at that time arisen, heard evidence, and the umpire subsequently made his award, after his power to act had arisen, but without giving any notice to the parties who had protested, the award was set aside as invalid (z). But where the arbitrators and the umpire were all present from the commencement of the proceedings, and heard all the evidence, whilst sitting together, and the umpire afterwards, on the disagreement of the arbitrators, made his award without further communication with the parties, Knight Bruce, V. C., decided that the award could not be set aside on the ground that the umpire joined in the inquiry before the time for his acting had arrived (a). Unless an award is shown to be clearly defective and illegal, the courts of law will not set it aside upon motion, but will leave the parties to their ordinary remedy; and if the party objecting to the award is a landowner, whose lands the company have taken, he may raise the question of illegality, by bringing an action of trespass or ejectment (b).

When awards are not set aside upon motion.

When awards are conclusive and cannot be impeached.

In another part of this work (c) a remark is made on the apparent injustice of permitting all verdicts found by juries summoned under the Consolidation Act to be conclusive, whilst errors in fact or in law, committed at Nisi Prius, are frequently re-argued and corrected in our Courts. The same remark is applicable to awards made under the Consolidation Acts. Numerous instances have occurred in which parties aggrieved have endeavoured in vain to obtain redress by applying to the Courts. Mistakes made by the arbitrator on matters of law do not generally invalidate an award (d): and, even where the decision of the arbitrator has been contrary to the evidence, there is no sufficient ground afforded for setting aside the award (e), unless collusion, or, in other words, fraud, is proved. The reason why awards cannot be impeached for errors in fact or errors in law, not apparent on the face of the award, seems to be founded on the principle that arbitrators are judges of the parties own choosing (f). A distinction on this point seems, however, to exist in the case of awards made under the Consolidation Acts, because, as we have seen, if either of the arbitrators refuse to concur in the appointment of an umpire, the Board of Trade are empowered to appoint him, without any previous communication with either of the contending parties. There is, however, one remedy which may be available in some instances. If it is found that the arbitrators or umpire are entertaining a question which they ought not to entertain, an application may be made to the Court or a judge to revoke the submission (g)—for although 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, s. 25, enacts that neither party shall have power to revoke the submission, without the consent of the other, the Court or a judge would still have the power to interfere, if it appeared that arbitrators or an umpire, appointed under the acts, are about to exceed their jurisdiction.

Several instances of invalid awards are mentioned in other parts of this work. Thus, we have seen that an award is bad, if the previous notices are defective, so that the interest of the party in the matters to be adjudicated upon is left in doubt (h), or if the lands valued are different from those which were the subject of the notice to treat (i).

But where a deed of submission was made between L. and a railway company, and after reciting that the company were authorized to take certain lands, that they had given L. notice that they required his lands, and that it was agreed that they should become the purchasers thereof in the mode thereafter pointed out, it was covenanted that it should be referred to an arbitrator to determine the value to be paid for the lands; that the purchase-money should be paid within three days after the making of the award, and "thereupon" L. should execute a conveyance, "subject to the payment of the amount of such purchase-money into the Court of Chancery, under the circumstances and in the manner provided for by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act." And the arbitrator found the value of the land at a certain sum, and directed it to be paid "within three days after," &c., "subject," &c. (following the words of the submission), and a rule having been obtained, calling upon the company to show cause why they should not pay the sum of money, under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 18, Wightman, J., decided—1. That, assuming even that the arbitrator had exceeded his jurisdiction in ordering the money to be paid, the rest of the award was good; and that, as the award ascertained the amount of the purchase-money which the company by their deed of submission had agreed to pay, there was sufficient to enable the Court to make an order on them to pay it. 2. That the payment of the money and the execution of the conveyance by L. were not dependent conditions, but that the payment was to precede the conveyance, and that it was, therefore, no answer to the rule that a conveyance had not been tendered. 3. That it was no objection that it was not shown that the company had taken possession of the land (k).

Re Ware.

By a Canal Act, which incorporated the Lands Clauses Act, the company were authorized to take a field called "Clayfield," held by one W., under a lease from the warden of All Souls, Oxford. Notice to take this field having been given, and the parties being unable to agree as to the terms, an arbitrator was appointed under the act to settle the question of disputed compensation. The company had taken a portion of Clayfield, but had left the rest in the possession of W., without, however, giving him any access to it; but they had delivered to the warden a grant of a right of road to that portion, which it was stipulated was to enure for the benefit of W. and his tenants, the way so granted being more commodious than before. The arbitrator awarded to W. a pecuniary compensation in respect of the works of the company and the lands taken by them. An application to set aside the award having been made, on the grounds that the arbitrator had omitted to adjudicate on the right of way to Clayfield, and that he had not awarded damages for prospective damage which might be caused by floods, or apportioned the rent of the leasehold land, or determined in what proportion the rent should remain chargeable:—It was decided, that the arbitrator had acted rightly under the Lands Clauses Act in awarding a money compensation only, and that he would have exceeded his powers if he had adjudicated either on the question of the right of way, or of the apportionment of the rent; also that the award was right in not giving compensation for injuries which had not actually arisen (l). By Arbitration.

Where an award was made after the company had entered on the lands under sect. 85, and the claimant disputed the validity of the award, and refused to make a title to the lands, and was prosecuting an action against the company to have the question as to the award determined, and the company, on the refusal of the claimant to send in an abstract of title, paid the amount of compensation awarded into the bank, and executed a deed-poll under sects. 76 and 77, and then applied to have a large sum of money restored to them, which they had originally paid into Court in pursuance of sect. 85, and this application being opposed by the claimant, who contended that, as the award was bad, the fund ought to remain in Court until the respective rights of the parties were determined; Lord Cottenham, C., said, that there was not sufficient ground stated to him to induce him to refuse the application; and he ordered the money to be paid to the company (m).

If claimant disputes an award, the company may nevertheless withdraw their deposit made under sect. 85.

Where a claim for purchase-money and compensation was, by agreement between the parties, referred to arbitration, and the owner consented that the company should enter on the land, and an award was made by the arbitrators, but a dispute arose as to its validity, and the claimant thereupon gave the company a notice to quit the lands, and brought an ejectment, it was decided that the action would not lie, for the plaintiff had no right to revoke the consent which he had given, as to the entry on the land, and his remedy was to proceed to enforce the payment of the amount of compensation (n).

Claimants disputing award may not bring ejectment if they consented to the entry on the lands.

An award may be enforced by an action on the award, and the costs may also be recovered, although they are not mentioned on the face of the award (o). Or a more summary remedy may be resorted to under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 18, when the submission is made a rule of Court; but it is not the practice of the Courts to grant applications under that statute, when any reasonable and well-founded doubts are raised as to the validity of the proceedings, because the defendants are deprived of the means of reviewing the decision of the Court, by a writ of error (p). It seems that an attachment will not lie against an incorporated company, like a railway company, for nonperformance of an award (q).

Enumeration of the steps preliminary to the inquisition.

8 & 9 Vict. c. 18,
s. 39, App. 52.

In all cases where purchase-money or other compensation is to be assessed by the verdict of a jury, the company are required to issue their warrant under their common seal, directed to the sheriff, or, if he be interested (r), to the coroner of the county, city, &c. in which the lands, the subject of the compensation, are situate (s), whereby they require him to summon a jury to assess the purchase-money and other compensation. It is not necessary to repeat the remarks which have already been made, as to the necessity of proceeding in strict compliance with the directions of the statute, in taking all steps preliminary to the holding of the inquisition. These steps in ordinary cases, are first a notice from the company to the owners, &c. of the lands, requiring them to treat (t). Secondly, the claim or reply of the owners, given in conformity with the terms of the notice (u). Thirdly, the notice from the company of their intention to issue a warrant, and a tender of a sum of money for compensation (x). Fourthly, the warrant from the company directed to the sheriff (y). Fifthly, the notice given by the sheriff to the company, of the time and place of holding the inquisition (z). Sixthly, a similar notice given by the company to the claimant of compensation (a). And, lastly, the verdict and judgment (b). In addition to these notices, it may in some cases be necessary for a claimant to give notice that he requires the company to take the whole of a house or other building (c), or he may give notice to the company, that he requires a special jury (d).

We have also seen, that in cases where the claimant demands compensation under sect. 68, he is required to give notice to the company of the amount of his claim, and he has also the option of expressing his desire to have the same assessed by a jury (e), and the company are required, under a heavy penalty, to issue their warrant to the sheriff, and the subsequent proceedings then follow as in ordinary cases.

Act relating to the subject now under consideration. We have already seen that, by sect. 38 (f), the company are required to give ten days' notice of their intention to summon a jury, and in such notice they are also required to state what sum they are willing to give for their interest in the lands sought to be purchased, and for the damage to be sustained by the execution of the works (g). If this offer be not accepted, the company issue their warrant to the sheriff of the county in which the lands are situate, or to a coroner, if the sheriff be interested (h), requiring him to summon a jury: (Sects. 39, 40.) On receipt of the warrant, the sheriff summons a jury of twenty-four qualified persons, and gives notice to the company (i) of the time and place appointed for the meeting, concerning both of which special provisions are made (Sect. 41); and a like notice must be given by the company to the claimant (k): (Sect. 46.) A juryman cannot be summoned, without his consent, more than once in every year: (Sect. 57.) The sheriff, under-sheriff, or other legal competent deputy (l), presides at the inquiry (m); and the party claiming compensation is to be deemed the plaintiff, and has all such rights and privileges as the plaintiff is entitled to in trials of actions at law (n) (Sect. 43): and if the party claiming compensation appears (Sect. 47), a jury of twelve persons is drawn in the usual manner: (Sect. 42.) Either party may request the sheriff to summon witnesses, or to order a view: (Sect. 43.) The jury and witnesses are sworn: (Sect. 48.) And if they or the sheriff neglect their duties, they are liable to pay certain penalties, and every penalty payable by a sheriff or juryman is to be applied in satisfaction of the costs of the inquiry, so far as the same will extend: (Sects. 44, 45.) Either party may have a special jury (o) (Sects. 54, 55); and, by consent, more than one inquiry may be had before the same special jury: (Sect. 56.) If the party claiming compensation shall not appear at the time appointed for the inquiry, such inquiry shall not be further proceeded in, but the compensation to be paid shall be such as shall be ascertained by a surveyor appointed by two justices, in manner thereafter provided: (Sect. 47.)

The foregoing are the statutory provisions which regulate the preliminary proceedings before the sheriff. There are but a few decisions touching this part of our subject. As it is a general rule of law, that no interested person can act as a judge in a judicial proceeding (p), it is a fatal error if the sheriff or other presiding judge be interested in the matter. But any objection to the competency of the sheriff, or other presiding officer, must, if known (q), be taken at the hearing of the inquiry (r). Thus, where an inquiry directed to the sheriff was held before an under-sheriff, who was a shareholder in the company, but it appeared that the claimant's attorney was informed of that fact before the inquiry commenced, a certiorari to remove the inquisition was refused, on the ground that, as no objection was made until the verdict had been given, the claimant had waived any right to object (s).

If the under-sheriff be interested in the inquiry, as by being a shareholder in the company, the warrant ought nevertheless to be directed to the sheriff, and he may preside in person, or authorize some other disinterested party to preside as his deputy (t). It also seems that a challenge to the array is not given by sections 54 and 55 (u).

It may be convenient in this place to notice that, by some of the railway acts passed in 1864 (x), it is provided, that questions of disputed compensation to be assessed by a jury in the City of London are to be heard in the Lord Mayor's Court.

8 & 9 Vict. c. 18,
s. 49, App. 53.

By sect. 50, the sheriff before whom such inquiry (a) shall be held shall give judgment for the purchase-money or compensation assessed by such jury, and the verdict and judgment shall be signed by the sheriff, and being so signed shall be kept (b) by the clerk of the peace among the records of the general or quarter sessions of the county in which the lands or any part thereof shall be situate, in respect of which such purchase-money or compensation shall have been awarded; and such verdicts and judgments shall be deemed records, and the same, or true copies thereof, shall be good evidence in all courts and elsewhere; and all persons may inspect the said verdicts and judgments, and may have copies thereof or extracts therefrom.

The verdict and judgment,
Sect. 50.

There was for a long time considerable doubt upon the question whether or not the jury have power to inquire into the right or title of the claimant to compensation. In 1854, however, a majority of the judges of the Court of Queen's Bench decided, in R. v. L. and N. W. R. Co. (c), that they have not any such power, but must assume that the claimant is entitled to compensation, and assess the damages upon that assumption. And, in 1857, the Court of Exchequer

Jury cannot inquire into the right.

(y) These words are directory only, and enable the company, or the claimant, at the meeting, to call upon the sheriff to keep the evidence distinct, and to require the jury to find a separate sum in respect of each claim. *Corrigal v. (z) Re Ware, 9 Exch. 401. When compensation is assessed under a statute, which requires to ascertain the amount of compensation to be paid for lands, and in respect of other damage separately, it is the duty of the company, and not of the claimant, to see that the verdict and judgment is properly drawn up. Re London and Greenwich R. Co., ubi supra.

(a) In Taylor v. Clemson, 2 Q. B. 1028, Maule, J., suggested that an inquisition, like a conviction, may be drawn up at any time. The inquisition should be signed in the name of the sheriff, although the inquiry be held before the under-sheriff. Stroud v. Watts, 3 D. & L. 799; 15 L. J. (C. P.) 196; R. v. Perkin, 7 Q. Eastern Counties R. Co.*, 12 M. & W. 237.

(b) If the proceedings have been irregular, prohibition does not lie to prevent the verdict and judgment from being inrolled. The proper course is to quash them by certiorari. Chabot v. Lord Morpeth, 15 Q. B. 446; 19 L. J. (Q. B.) 377.

decided Chapman v. Monmouthshire R. Co. (d) in accordance with the decision of the Queen's Bench, as indeed they were bound to do. But in the former case, Erle, C. J., expressed an opinion, that the jury had jurisdiction to try the right as incidental to the question of amount of compensation; and upon the trial of the latter case, Willes, J., stated that he adopted the views of Erle, C. J. In 1863, however, the Court of Queen's Bench upheld their previous decision (e). Until, therefore, the question can be carried to a Court of Error, it must be considered as settled for all practical purposes, that the jury have no power to inquire into the right.

But may award nil.

But although the judges in R. v. L. and N. W. R. Co. differed upon the above point, they all concurred in another point, viz., in approving of a former decision (f), in which it had been held, that, if the jury find the damage nominal or infinitesimally small, they may find the amount of compensation nil.

If the right to compensation is denied, the question must be tried in an action for the amount assessed upon a traverse of the right (g). But in such an action the quantum of damages cannot be disputed (h).

Nor can the sheriff and jury inquire whether the preliminary notices have been given.

And it seems also to be settled law (i), that the sheriff and jury have no right to inquire into the preliminary matters which precede the issuing of the warrant to the sheriff (k). The duty of the jury is to proceed to assess the value of, and the injury done to, the lands mentioned in the warrant, and if the warrant refers to lands which

(k) This rule will affect the right to begin, at the holding of the inquisition. In Taylor v. Clemson, 2 Q. B. 998, we find recorded the experience of two very learned and eminent advocates on this subject. "Lord Abinger, C. B.—I recollect a case in which this question arose. When Sir William Garrow, then attorney-general, attended on behalf of some company, in a compensation case before the Recorder of London, he claimed to begin, on the ground that it lay upon the company to show jurisdiction, by proving a tender and refusal of compensation. I was counsel for the claimant, and opposed this, but unsuccessfully. But afterwards the same question arose, under one of the Bristol Dock Acts, on the Oxford circuit, before Thomson, C. B., who decided that the company had no right to begin, saying he had no jurisdiction to inquire into the matter, the act entitling the parties, if they pleased, to try the question before the judge instead of the sheriff. A motion was afterwards made for a new trial; but the Court of Queen's Bench confirmed the ruling of the Lord Chief Baron, saying that the other practice was improper, and that there was no jurisdiction to inquire into the preliminary matter. Another case of the same kind afterwards occurred before Le Blanc, J. He ruled in the same way; and the Court of Queen's Bench confirmed his ruling." Cresswell, who was counsel for the plaintiff in Taylor v. Clemson, stated that the same rule had been followed, on the taking of the inquisition, after argument on the other side by the counsel for the company.

the company have not duly treated for, in pursuance of the statutory directions, the inquisition will be a nullity, and no title to the lands can be conferred thereby (l).

By a Jury.

The compensation assessed in ordinary cases is in respect of the value of the lands purchased, taking into account the damage done by the severance, and the amount of all injury done or to be done to the lands held therewith, which is apparent and capable of being ascertained and estimated at the time when the compensation is awarded (m), but not in respect of contingent and possible damages which may arise afterwards, by the works of the railway, at other places, and which could not be foreseen by the arbitrators or jury (n).

Compensation is assessed only for damage capable of being ascertained at the time of the inquisition.

It is also worthy of remark at this place (although the subject is discussed hereafter) (o), that when proceedings were first taken under sect. 68, Lord Cottenham, C., restrained the claimant by injunction, in a case (p) where the right to recover the compensation appeared to him to be doubtful, and he directed the claimant to bring an action against the company, who were to make certain admissions, so that the legal right to receive compensation might be determined, and this rule was followed by Lord Langdale, M.R., in Sutton Harbour Improvement Co. v. Hitchins (q); but Lord Truro, C. (r), Lord Cranworth, V.C. (s), and Sir G. Turner, V.C. (t), subsequently declined to issue injunctions, although the facts brought before them were very similar to those in the case first referred to (u). In one of these cases Lord Cranworth said:—

Although the claimant's right to demand compensation be doubtful, injunction does not lie.

"The argument on the present motion has led me to consider more attentively the principle of Lord Cottenham's decision. I must confess the most profound respect for all that proceeded from that very eminent judge, yet I cannot say that I feel convinced by his reasoning. It may be that the alteration introduced into the laws, by enabling a party claiming compensation to get rid of the mandamus, was an unwise change, still it was the act of the legislature. A course of proceeding is chalked out, whereby a party, alleging that he has suffered an infringement of a legal right, is enabled, in a particular mode of legal proceeding, to obtain legal redress. He cannot get that redress without establishing his title to compensation and the amount of damage he has sustained; and the legislature, having pointed out the steps by which he is to arrive at the result, what right has this Court to say to a party affected by no equity whatever, 'You shall not proceed to assert your legal rights in the mode prescribed by law?' I can discover neither principle nor authority for such interference."

By a Jury.

It has already been pointed out, that where the proceedings are under sect. 68, the company are not required to give ten days' notice of their intention to summon a jury (x).

The form of the inquisition.

With respect to the form of the inquisition, it has been said, that, inasmuch as there is to be an extraordinary jurisdiction exercised by the sheriff, everything which is made preliminary by the act of Parliament ought to be set out on the face of the inquisition (y). But recent decisions have not supported this doctrine.

Taylor v. Clemson.

This question, as to the necessity of showing jurisdiction on the inquisition, was discussed at great length in Taylor v. Clemson in the Exchequer Chamber (z); and all the authorities on the subject will there be found collected and arranged in admirable order. The Court, in delivering the judgment, said:—

“The authority given by the statute to the railway company, to take the lands of individuals for the purposes of the act, where it is exercised adversely, and not by consent, is undoubtedly an authority to be carried into effect by means unknown to the common law. And it is, therefore, contended, on the part of the plaintiff, that the same rule will apply to these proceedings which is held to apply to all other inferior jurisdictions, that, unless sufficient appears upon the face of the proceedings themselves to show that the jurisdiction exists, such proceedings are altogether void. Admitting such to be the rule of law, and not further relying on the special finding by the jury, that all which was necessary to give jurisdiction under the statute did really and in fact take place, than to observe that the whole objection is confined to the face of the proceedings themselves, the question is, whether, either expressly or by necessary intendment, the proceedings do of themselves show that they were warranted by the statute. And we are of opinion that, upon fair and necessary intendment, the jurisdiction appears upon the proceedings themselves.”

The Exchequer Chamber accordingly decided, that, when the warrant to the sheriff was annexed to the inquisition, they might be considered as one entire proceeding; and any deficiency existing in one document might be aided by reference to the other; and that, inasmuch as no particular form was prescribed by the statute, it was sufficient if the jurisdiction substantially appeared upon the face of the documents, or might be inferred therefrom (a).

But when this case was taken to the House of Lords (b), the arguments took a wider range, and two principal objections were urged against the validity of the inquisition, i. e. first, that it did not appear on the warrant, or inquisition, that the parties had disagreed as to the sum to be paid as compensation; and, secondly, that it nowhere appeared that notice of the proceedings before the jury had been previously given, in pursuance of the statute, and that consequently no jurisdiction whatever appeared. These objections were both overruled by the House of Lords, and Lord Cottenham's judgment clearly expresses the grounds of this important decision.

The form of the Inquisition.

Lord Cottenham's judgment in Taylor v. Clemson.

His lordship said:—

"If the arguments of the plaintiff be well founded, the railway company acquired no title to the lands in question; and that, not from any omission of what the act required them to do for the purpose of acquiring a title, but from a defect in the form of the inquisition by which the value of the lands was assessed. If the objection be fatal to the title of the company to these lands, there can be no doubt but that similar objections will be found to apply to very many titles derived under the various acts of Parliament which have, of late years, been in operation for the carrying on of public works.

"The special verdict finds, that everything was done which the act required for the protection of the owner of the property: the question, therefore, is purely one of form, which, if successful, would be destructive of the real merits of the case. This (although no reason for departing from any established rule) may properly be taken into consideration, if the case do not fall within the principle of decided authorities.

"The first objection to the title of the company is, that the inquisition, ascertaining the amount of the purchase-money, does not show that there was any authority under the act for such proceeding; that is, that it does not allege that the parties had not previously agreed upon such amount: for the absence of an agreement for that purpose was all that the act required to justify the warrant, and to give jurisdiction to the sheriff and jury. Now the warrant, which was referred to, and annexed to the inquisition, required the sheriff to impanel and swear a jury for the purpose of inquiring, assessing, and giving a verdict for the sum of money to be paid; and by the inquisition, taken in pursuance of this warrant, the jury find, assess and give their verdict for a sum of money to be paid for the purchase of the premises, by the said act of Parliament authorized to be taken by the said company; and the sheriff thereupon pronounces and gives judgment for such purchase-money, according to the directions of the act. It certainly does not, in terms, negative the fact of the parties having previously agreed upon the amount of the purchase-money, but it states that which is utterly inconsistent with any such fact. If the amount of the purchase-money had been previously agreed upon, the jury could not have assessed, and the sheriff could not have adjudged, the amount of such purchase-money. Whatever form might have been gone through, the amount of purchase-money would have been that which had been adjudicated upon. It will not be found, upon an examination of the cases, that any inquisition has been held defective for not alleging a fact necessarily implied from those which are alleged; and if that be so, there cannot be any ground for doing so for the first time in the present instance. This was the ground upon which the judges in the Exchequer Chamber held the proceeding to be free from objection upon this point, and which was before them, and now is sufficient to dispose of the first objection raised. Had this not been so, it would have been proper to consider whether it can be necessary, in any case, that there should be, on the proceedings, averments of facts into which the parties had no authority to inquire; and of which, therefore, they could have no judicial knowledge."

Inquisition.*

Lord Cottenham's judgment in Taylor v. Clemson.

Lord Cottenham then described the effect of the decided cases (many of which are cited, ante, p. 306, note (y)) and proceeded as follows:—

“I have now examined all the cases which have been relied upon on either side, and the result appears to be, 1st. That if it be necessary that the inquisition should state the absence of an agreement between the parties, what appears upon the present inquisition was in R. v. Swansea Harbour (c), decided to be sufficient, and in R. v. Croke (d) was assumed to be so, from the objection not having been taken; 2nd. That, except in what fell from Lord Mansfield in the latter case, and from Lord Denman in R. v. Committeemen of the South Holland Drainage (e), there does not appear to be any authority for holding that the inquisition or other proceeding need state any matter not cognizable by the authority whence such proceedings emanate, and all reasoning appears to be against any such rule. The instances referred to by Lord Abinger (f), in the Court below, prove that such preliminary matters were not cognizable by the sheriff and jury, and could not be the subject of proof before them. How, then, can it be necessary or proper that their inquisition should state facts, of which they could not have received any proof, particularly when, by the 138th section of the act, and the authority of Baston v. Carew (g), such statement would have been conclusive.

“A second objection was raised in argument in this House, which I do not see noticed in the report of the case before the Exchequer Chamber, and that is, the want of any statement as to notice of the proceeding before the jury, as required by the 138th section. This, if not removed by the observations before made, will be answered by the case of Doe d. Payne v. Bristol R. Co. (h), which decided, that what was made necessary by way of proviso in the act need not be alleged in the proceeding; but the want of it was to be brought forward by the objecting party. The affidavits show that no such case exists in point of fact.”

Ostler v. Cooke.

The warrant and inquisition held good, although they did not recite the previous proceedings.

This case was followed by Ostler v. Cooke (i). There, commissioners under a drainage act, containing compulsory powers for taking lands similar to those in the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, caused a notice to be given to the landowner, which duly stated the particulars of the land required, but the warrant, subsequently issued to the sheriff, requiring him to summon a jury, merely described the land as “three acres, twelve roods and twenty perches of land in the parish of B.,” which were required for the purposes of the act, without referring to the notice previously given in pursuance of the acts; and in the inquisition, the money was awarded “for the purchase of three acres, twelve roods and twenty perches of land,” following the description of the land contained in the warrant. An action of trespass was brought to try the validity of this inquisition, and it was objected that the warrant and inquisition ought to have referred to the notice to treat, or at all events to have given the description and particulars of the land required, otherwise the warrant might apply to any land of the claimant, within the district. The Court, however, held that the proceedings were not irregular, and said, that by the act the jury were only to inquire into the amount of the compensation to be awarded for the land required, and the judgment was for the money awarded, and not for the land. If the commissioners should give evidence of the value of other land than that mentioned and described in their notice, the proceeding would be void, and they would have no power to enter upon any land of the plaintiff. The Court observed, that there was no question as to the identity of the land, as evidence of value was given on both sides, and there was a view; and neither by the terms of the act nor by any general rule of law was it necessary that the notice should be referred to, or any particular description of the land given in the warrant, to give jurisdiction to the sheriff and the jury. The Court added, "The case of Taylor v. Clemson, in the Exchequer Chamber, and afterwards in the House of Lords, was cited on both sides, upon the argument, but the judgments in that case, and particularly that in the House of Lords, appear to us to be in accordance with our view of the present case." A writ of error was afterwards brought in the Exchequer Chamber, but that court affirmed the judgment in the court below, in the following terms (k):—

"The question is, whether the warrant and inquisition ought to have contained, on their faces, a particular description of the lands which were valued by the jury. It certainly would have been more convenient if they had so particularized them, but the proceedings are not void because they have not done so. The effect of the inquisition is not to make a parliamentary conveyance of the lands, but only to estimate the amount to be paid by the commissioners, before they make an entry on the premises required by the notice; and, as soon as that amount is tendered to the landowner, the commissioners are at liberty to enter on the lands. If no title be made out to the land, the amount of compensation may be deposited in the Bank, under the section in the act. If evidence had been given before the jury, as to any other land than that to which the notice applied, the inquisition would have been irregular, and might have been set aside. But here the notice given to the plaintiff by the defendants described the precise quantity of the land they required, with all requisite particularity, and no question was made as to the identity of the land."

But, notwithstanding these decisions, it may perhaps be at least unobjectionable to show, on the face of the proceedings, a description of the lands taken, and that the proper notices were given by the parties upon whose application the warrant to the sheriff was issued (l).

The cases also show that it is no objection, that it does not appear, on the inquisition, that the whole of the capital had been subscribed for, although, by the terms of the statute, the compulsory powers to take lands could not be resorted to until such a subscription was made (m). Nor need it appear that a certificate of two justices had been obtained, to certify that an erroneous description of lands in the book of reference proceeded from mistake (n). When certiorari

It lies if the sheriff and jury act jurisdiction.

*R. v. Bristol and

We may now proceed to inquire what remedies exist, in cases where the proceedings before the sheriff and jury have been erroneous, or objectionable to either of the parties interested in the inquiry.

The act provides, that "no proceeding shall be quashed or vacated for want of form, or be removed, by certiorari or otherwise, into any of the superior courts" (p). But although the certiorari is thus taken away (q), the courts will interfere, if it clearly appears that the proceeding has related to some matter, over which the sheriff had no jurisdiction whatever; or if the proceeding itself is impeached as being invalid, on the ground of malversation (r), or that the sheriff was interested (s). The case of R. v. Bristol and Exeter R. Co. (t) may appear, at first sight, to break in upon this rule. There a certiorari was applied for to quash an inquisition, and one of the objections relied upon was, that the lands, taken by a railway company, and for which the jury were summoned to assess compensation, were situate more than one hundred yards beyond the line of deviation. It was contended, in support of the writ, that, although the certiorari was taken away by the special act, yet, as the proceedings were altogether illegal, and there was a total want of jurisdiction, the certiorari would lie. On the other hand, it was contended, that, if the proceedings were merely null, the certiorari was unnecessary, and the parties entering would be liable in trespass.

(t) 11 A. & E. 202, n.; 2 Railw. C. 99.

The Court of Queen's Bench refused to grant the certiorari; and it appears that the learned judges adopted the argument urged by the counsel for the defendants. Littledale, J., observes:—

Certiorari to remove Inquisition.

R. v. Bristol and Exeter R. Co.

"The parties applying are not without remedy, for they may bring trespass, if the proceedings are void. It is argued that there will be a prima facie justification, if the proceedings be not quashed. I doubt whether that would be so in any case; but clearly it would not be so where there has been a deviation from the line laid down."

It therefore appears that a writ of certiorari was refused, on the ground that the party had a sufficient remedy by action, although it was assumed that the affidavits showed that the sheriff had no jurisdiction to assess compensation for the lands which were taken for the purposes of the railway (u). But, in the subsequent case of R. v. Sheffield and Manchester R. Co. (x), the court took occasion to repeat the general proposition, that, whenever a want of jurisdiction appeared, it was competent for the Court of Queen's Bench to interfere by certiorari, although the writ be taken away by the express words of the statute. Lord Denman, C. J., said:—

R. v. Sheffield and Manchester R. Co.

"The fair import of R. v. Bristol and Exeter R. Co. is, that where the act done is locally and visibly out of the jurisdiction, it is then the act of a stranger; and we cannot consider it in any court at all, but leave the party to their remedy by an action of trespass; as, if an inquisition were held in Bedfordshire, to assess the value of lands in another county; but this is something sought to be shown without the jurisdiction, by extrinsic evidence, and that, too, where there is a clause in the act which, by enacting that it shall be a record, makes the sheriff's return alone evidence; and therefore a wrong-doer would be protected, if he could induce the sheriff to make a false return" (y).

And Patteson and Coleridge, Js., without going to the extent of overruling R. v. Bristol and Exeter R. Co., intimated that it was not necessary to justify everything that might have been said by the court in that case.

In another case (z) a landowner, whose lands had been taken and severed by the line of a railway, made a claim for compensation, which was to be assessed by a jury "in respect of the purchase of the land,—for damage to other lands by the severance of the purchased land from them,—and for injuriously affecting such other

South Wales R. Co. v. Richards.

(u) The party whose lands were taken afterwards brought ejectment against the company. But the Court of Exchequer decided that the special act authorized the company to make such a deviation as included the lands in question. See Doe d. Payne v. Bristol and Exeter R. Co., 6 M. & W. 320; 2 Railw. C. 75; post, 363. It was not suggested by the counsel for the defendants that the inquisition was a bar to the action.

The court intimated that, by the consent of the claimant, the verdict might be allowed to stand for the sums properly awarded in respect of the unobjectionable claims. See also Jubb v. Hull Dock Co., 9 Q. B. 443, ante, 252; Penny v. South Eastern R. Co., 26 L. J. (Q. B.) 252; 7 E. & B. 660; ante, 242.

lands by the execution of the railway and works." It appeared that the line of the railway, when made, would cross an occupation road leading from the claimant's residence to the high road, and as the occupation road was crossed on a level, the claimant required that a bridge should be thrown over the railway, whilst the company contended that a level crossing was sufficient, and no definite agreement as to the communication had been arrived at, previously to the hearing of the case before the jury. Under these circumstances it was urged for the claimant, that the jury should allow for the expenses of providing a bridge, but the company alleged that the jury ought not to take the matter into their consideration at all, because the subject of communication was a matter left, by the acts, entirely for the decision of justices of the peace (a). The under-sheriff adopted the latter view of the case, but the jury delivered their verdict, whereby they gave several sums: first, for the value of the land purchased and compulsory possession; secondly, for severance at thirty years' purchase; thirdly, for loss of water; and, lastly, 450*l.* for "severance, owing to the crossing and expense incurred thereby."

The company thereupon obtained a writ of certiorari to quash the inquisition, on the ground that the jury had no right to entertain the question, in respect of which they had given the 450*l.*; and the Court of Queen's Bench decided that there was a clear excess of jurisdiction, in a substantial matter, and the inquisition was quashed. The court said:—

"This rule cannot be made absolute unless it distinctly appears that, in the proceedings, the sheriff and jury have taken upon themselves to decide on a matter over which they had no jurisdiction. Where that is made out, the statutory prohibition does not apply, and the inherent jurisdiction of this court is unrestrained; nor need the excess of jurisdiction in the court below appear in every part of its proceeding, for it cannot give validity to one act, in itself beyond the power of the court, because it has, at the same time, done another which it was competent to do."

It may, therefore, now be assumed, that the rule applicable to the removal of inquisitions is that which has been already laid down. The application of that rule is, however, not unattended with difficulties. In the case last mentioned, it is said—"There is a great disposition to evade clauses in acts of Parliament which take away the certiorari on the alleged excess of jurisdiction; and we feel bound not to yield to attempts of this kind, unless they rest on very clear and satisfactory grounds" (b). And a very learned judge (c) has observed, "There is a perpetual endeavour to get rid of clauses which take away certiorari, by impugning the jurisdiction. Such attempts we ought carefully to watch, otherwise the clauses would be rendered nugatory." And the Court of Queen's Bench, acting on this principle, have decided, that where an inquisition had been taken before a clerk to the under-sheriff, and an assessor appointed, pro hac vice, by the sheriff, they not being persons specially named in the act, there was no ground for granting a certiorari (d), inasmuch as this deviation from the requisites of the act was a mere irregularity, and not an excess of jurisdiction. And where the certiorari was taken away, and the company issued a warrant to the sheriff, requiring him to assess compensation to the claimant "for damages (if any) which shall have been done by reason of the execution of the works," it was contended that the warrant was void, and that therefore the jurisdiction never attached; but the court refused a certiorari, as the warrant (though it ought not to have contained the words "if any") gave jurisdiction (e).

Certiorari to remove Inquisition.

But not for mere irregularity.

A party who seeks to set aside an inquisition must come into Court with clean hands, for he may so conduct himself as to be held incompetent to take an objection to the inquisition, which would be perfectly good under ordinary circumstances. This rule has been applied in a case where a party treated land as his own freehold, when a negotiation for purchase was going on; and he was held to be incompetent to set up as an objection, that the lands belonged to his wife, and were copyhold, and that the inquisition awarded no compensation to the parties who held these interests in the land. He was also held to be estopped from objecting, that, by the inquisition, the company were directed to commit a trespass, by making a hedge on other land belonging to the complainant, it not being positively stated in the affidavit that less compensation had been given to him in consequence; and it appearing, that, when he demanded compensation, he had required a certain sum to be given to him, and also made it a condition that the company should erect the fence in question (f).

Parties may be estopped from taking objections.

The writ of certiorari is not therefore taken away in all cases, but the objections, which may be raised to the proceedings before the sheriff, are limited to cases where it appears that the proceeding relates to some matter over which the sheriff had no jurisdiction, or unless the proceeding itself is impeached, as being invalid on the ground of malversation.

Certiorari to remove Inquisition.

Objections to issuing the certiorari are available on a motion to quash the inquisition when brought up (g).

Mode of proceeding to obtain writ of certiorari.

We shall now proceed to describe the mode of proceeding to obtain a writ of certiorari (h). And, first, the statutory regulations, limiting a time for issuing writs of certiorari, and requiring notice to be given of applications for them, and recognizance to be entered into before allowance, do not apply to inquisitions or other proceedings before sheriffs (i).

Affidavits.

It is extremely important that the affidavits should be carefully prepared (k). If any important fact be stated in uncertain language, the Court will refuse the writ. And any failure of this kind is the more serious in its results, in consequence of a rule of practice, which, if not universal and inflexible, is as nearly so as possible, i.e., that the Court will not allow a party to make a second application for the writ, if he has previously applied to the Court upon insufficient affidavits (l).

Defects in proceedings should be clearly stated in the affidavit.

It will, therefore, be proper that all defects in the proceedings should be positively sworn to, and, if possible, a copy of the inquisition should be annexed; or, if that cannot be procured, the party making the affidavit should swear directly to his information and belief, as to its contents.

Thus in R. v. Manchester and Leeds R. Co. (m), a party sought to set aside an inquisition on the ground that some of the lands taken by the company, and for which damages were given by the inquisition, were not included in the schedule annexed to the railway act, neither had two justices certified that the omission proceeded from mistake, and that, consequently, the company had no right to take the land; and the application was founded on an affidavit made by the owner of the lands. The Court refused the application for a certiorari, in

(h) See also ante, 281, note (x). It seems that the rule to show cause why the writ should not issue may be directed to the company, although the inquisition be out of their custody. R. v. Manchester and Leeds R. Co., 1 Per. & Dav. 164; but see S. C., 8 A. & E. 424, note (a).

(i) See 5 Geo. 2, c. 19, s. 2; 13 Geo. 2, c. 18, s. 5.

(k) The affidavits in support of the application for the writ must be intituled "In the Queen's Bench" only, and sworn in court before a judge or commissioner for taking affidavits in the Queen's Bench. The certiorari is directed to the parties taking the inquisition, adapted to the particular case, and describing the inquisition as in the rule of the court, and is to be issued as other writs on the Crown side. Corner's Practice, 91.

consequence of the defective mode of stating the objections to the inquisition. Lord Denman, C. J., said:—

Certiorari to remove Inquisition.

R. v. Manchester and Leeds R. Co.

“We should issue the certiorari, if it distinctly appeared that the jury had comprehended in their verdict anything which they were not authorized to include. But we cannot assume that the fact is so, unless the affidavits positively state it. They should either set out the inquisition, or show that the deponent has no copy, and then distinctly state that he is informed of, and believes, the facts raising the objection. Here all that appears as to the inquisition is, that the party ‘objects’ that certain deficiencies exist. It is said that this is an objection upon oath; but suppose he had actually said, ‘I object upon oath,’ that would merely be a solemn form of stating the objection. Then, as to the authority of the company to take the lands, and of the jury to assess the value. This should be distinctly negatived. Here all that is positively sworn to is the description in the books of reference, which is alleged to be insufficient, and the statement by the applicant in his protest, that the lands were not properly described in the act or schedule. It should be shown positively that the justices have not certified; for their certificate would give the power. To assert, generally, that it is not the fact that the statute authorizes the proceeding, is not enough; it should be stated how it fails to do so. I disclaim the principle, that we are to issue a certiorari to bring up the inquisition, on the ground that there may probably be defects; we must clearly see that facts do exist which will bring the defects before us.”

Lastly, it is important to remember that any defect or want of jurisdiction may be shown by affidavit (n).

The importance of the subject we have been discussing seems to justify a few further observations on the effect of the language which is found in the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, which, by sect. 50, directs, that—

The effect of the inquisition and verdict.

8 & 9 Vict. c. 18.

“The sheriff, before whom such inquiry shall be held, shall give judgment for Sect. 50. the purchase-money or compensation assessed by such jury, and the verdict and judgment shall be signed by the sheriff, and being so signed shall be kept by the clerk of the peace among the records of the general or quarter sessions of the county in which the lands, or any part thereof, shall be situate, in respect of which such purchase-money or compensation shall have been awarded, and such verdicts and judgments shall be deemed records; and the same, or true copies thereof, shall be good evidence in all courts and elsewhere, and all persons may inspect the said verdicts and judgments, and may have copies thereof or extracts therefrom on paying for each inspection thereof one shilling, and for every one hundred words copied or extracted therefrom sixpence; which copies or extracts the clerk of the peace is hereby required to make out and to sign, and certify the same to be true copies.”

It is believed that no case has yet arisen in which the full effect and meaning of this section have been considered. But in the following cases, which all occurred previously to the passing of the Lands

Judgment.*

Clauses Act (o), the judges appear to have felt considerable difficulty in putting a construction upon statutes which contained similar provisions (p).

*R. v. Nottingham
Old Waterworks
Co.*

In an early case (q), an application was made to compel a company, by mandamus, to pay the amount of compensation, where the verdict and judgment had been duly enrolled at the sessions; and it was contended that the remedy was on the record, and that a writ of mandamus was therefore inapplicable. Patteson, J., observes:—

“If there be a specific remedy for this sum we cannot grant the mandamus. Now, the court of quarter sessions is to give judgment for the sum assessed by the jury, which judgment is to be conclusive; and the clerk of the peace is to sign the verdicts and judgments, which are to be registered and to become records. It seemed to me, at first, that, if these were judgments of record, they might be enforced like judgments of other Courts, by the process of the Court itself, if it had any process proper for the purpose, and, if not, by action of debt. But, on looking to the act, I doubt whether such a consequence can be admitted. These are not the ordinary records of the quarter sessions; and I have never heard of an action on a record of this sort.”

*R. v. Manchester

And the same learned judge, in a subsequent case (r), said:—

“As to what fell from me during the argument in the present case, respecting the effect of the inquisition, considered as a judgment, I merely wished to inquire whether, if it have the effect of a judgment of a court of record, error would not lie, and a certiorari be excluded. But I think that, in fact, this cannot be considered as a judgment. The section is drawn very loosely; but it does not, as far as I can understand it, give these proceedings an effect analogous to that of judgments of a court of record.”

of Swansea Har-

So Littledale, J., says in another case (s):—

“It is said, that, because this inquisition is to be kept among the records of the quarter sessions, it ought, as the record of an inferior Court, to set forth everything which was necessary to give jurisdiction. But the enactment is merely directory, that the judgment, having been given, shall be kept among the records of sessions; and, as to the judgment itself nothing is prescribed, except that the jury shall ascertain the sum to be paid for purchase or recompense, and the justices shall accordingly give judgment for such purchase-money or recompense so to be assessed.”

(o) The act having passed after the cases presently mentioned, it may very well be that the framers of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, knowing the difficulties which had arisen in those cases, advisedly omitted the words “to all intents and purposes,” in hopes of avoiding similiar difficulties.

(p) By some of the earlier statutes no conveyance appears to have been necessary to vest land in a company, after the compensation was assessed, and the inquisition recorded with the clerk of the peace. See Bruce v. Willis, 11 A. & E. 463. By other statutes, the conveyances of the lands were required to be enrolled at the sessions; R. v. Leeds and Liverpool Canal Co., ibid. 316; but under the provisions of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, the legal title of the company to the lands taken under the compulsory powers does not seem to be complete, until a conveyance has been executed. See post, 345.

Verdict and

It therefore appears that the enrolment of the verdicts and judgments with the clerk of the peace does not clothe them with the character of records for all purposes.

In a subsequent case it was, however, said by Lord Denman, C. J., and Patteson, J., that the effect of the record of the inquisition and judgment would be to operate as a conclusive bar in any action which might be brought to recover the lands (t).

It will be observed that in all the foregoing cases the special act provided that the verdict and judgment "should be binding and conclusive to all intents and purposes;" and that when deposited with the clerk of the peace, they should be deemed records "to all intents and purposes whatsoever." As these words are omitted in 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, a strong inference seems to arise, that the legislature did not intend that the verdicts and judgments, when enrolled, should of themselves be binding or conclusive, or that they are to be deemed records in the ordinary sense of the term; and it may be contended, that the language used in this statute will be sufficiently carried into effect, if it be construed to mean that the verdict and judgment, when enrolled, shall be deemed the record of the proceedings which actually took place before the sheriff (u). And it would seem that one main object of sect. 50 was to facilitate the proof of what took place before the sheriff and jury (x).

Having thus endeavoured to point out what defects in the inquisition may still be taken advantage of by certiorari, and the mode of applying for the writ, and the effect of the verdict when enrolled, we shall turn to another important branch of our inquiry.

It may happen that the proceedings taken on the inquisition before the sheriff are strictly regular in form and substance, and yet, through the perverseness or mistake of jurymen, or some other similar miscarriage, gross injustice may be done, in deciding the question of compensation submitted to the jury. In such a case, it is evident that a writ of certiorari will not lie to remove the inquisition, inasmuch as the writ is expressly taken away by the statute, and there is no want of jurisdiction, or any malversation on the part of the presiding officer (y).

No new trial can be obtained,

(t) R. v. Sheffield R. Co., 11 A. & E. 194; also Chabot v. Lord Morpeth, 15 Q. B. 449. But see the dictum of Littleton, J., in R. v. Bristol and Exeter R. Co., 11 A. & E. 204. It is also worthy of remark, that in Doe d. Payne v. Bristol and Exeter R. Co., 6 Mee. & W. 320, the counsel for the defendants did not contend that the inquisition was final; and in Corrigal v. London and Blackwall R. Co., 5 Man. & G. 219, the counsel for the plaintiff did not appear to have relied upon the demurrer to the fourth plea, on the ground that no proof except the record could be given.

(u) See ante, 309. It will be seen that the statute requires a conveyance to be made to perfect the title of the company to lands taken under the compulsory powers of the act. See post, 348, n. (u).

*The effect of the
Judgment.*

Is, then, the party aggrieved without any remedy? Upon this important question, R. v. Eastern Counties R. Co. (z) seems to be in point. That was an application for a mandamus commanding the defendants to issue a precept to the sheriff, to summon a jury to assess damages to F. It appeared that F. was tenant from year to year of premises near Chelmsford; that the fee simple of a portion of those lands was purchased for the purpose of constructing the railway thereon; and that the company also temporarily used a portion of the remainder of the land, by passing to and fro, with carts, &c., as they were empowered to do under the special act. F. having claimed compensation, a precept was issued by the company to the sheriff, to empanel a jury "to assess satisfaction, recompense, or compensation, for damage before that time done and sustained by the claimant in and about the lands now or formerly in his occupation, &c., by reason of the execution of any of the works by the said acts authorized, at, upon, or near to the said lands, or for the future, temporary or perpetual, or for any recurring damage to be done to, or sustained by him as aforesaid." At the trial, F. proposed to give evidence of damage done to growing crops, by the construction of the railway; and also of damage done by the temporary user of a portion of his land; and he offered evidence to show that a temporary road had been made over his meadow, destroying the pasturage, but that the meadow had, in other respects, always remained under his control. The under-sheriff, however, rejected this evidence, upon the ground, that, by the act, authority was given to justices to award damages in respect of the temporary occupation of any land. It was urged that this provision was not applicable, as there had not been a temporary occupation, but a mere user of the land; but the presiding judge withdrew this branch of the case from the consideration of the jury. A further objection was raised that the verdict was against evidence. F. had originally claimed 524*l.*; by his witnesses he proved damage to the amount of 411*l.* The company, by their witnesses, showed that the damage was 152*l.* 10*s.*; but the jury awarded only 49*l.*

Upon these facts it was contended, that, if the Court saw that obvious injustice had been done, it would not hesitate to put a party in a position to maintain his rights, but Coleridge J., said:—

"This was an application for a rule, calling upon the company to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue, commanding them to issue a precept to the sheriff to summon a jury, to assess damages for injury alleged to have been sustained by reason of the works of the railway. It appeared that such a precept had already issued, and that a jury had sat under it, to assess damages in respect of all the causes of damage for which compensation is now sought to be obtained, and that they returned a verdict for 49*l.* It is said that this is a sum grossly under the amount which the party is entitled to claim; that he proved damage to the amount of nearly 500*l.*, and the insufficiency of the verdict is attributed to two causes: one, that the sheriff excluded one entire set of damages from the consideration of the jury, on the ground that they were properly recoverable under a particular section of the company's act before a justice; another, that, although the claimant proved a much larger amount of damage than that found, the jury, from some personal cause, chose to give a verdict for an inadequate amount. It was admitted, that a direct motion for a new trial could not be made, and no doubt that was a proper admission, for the proceeding is the creature of the act of Parliament; and the section of the act, by which it is directed that such a proceeding shall be had, makes the verdict final; but, even if this be not so, I am at a loss to see what machinery this Court has to direct a new trial. But it was said that the Court might direct a second precept to issue. It appears to me, however, that if I acceded to such a proposition, I should only be doing a thing indirectly, which cannot be done directly. If a mandamus should go, the return would be that a precept has been already issued, and the only answer to such a return would be 'Yes; but justice has not been done under that precept;' so that, in point of fact, it would still come to the same thing, that the Court would be called upon to grant a new trial. I am informed that a like application has been made in the full Court in another case, and that it was refused. I do not know whether injustice has been done or not; but even if it has, I have no power to interfere, and no rule, therefore, can go in this case" (a).

The effect of the Verdict and Judgment.

R. v. Eastern Counties R. Co.

And in delivering judgment in R. v. L. and N. W. R. Co. (b), it was observed by the Court, that—

R. v. L. and N. W. R. Co.

"It must be admitted that even for a preliminary and inconclusive trial, a sheriff's jury are an unsatisfactory tribunal, and their decision additionally objectionable because no error in the direction given to them, nor any mistake or even perverseness in their finding, can be reviewed as in a trial at Nisi Prius."

It seems to be a peculiar anomaly, that a new trial may be had to correct any miscarriage which may occur in trials at Nisi Prius, where the judges of the superior courts preside, whilst the very important questions which arise in compensation cases are subject to no further inquiry or supervision, provided the sheriff had jurisdiction to enter upon the inquiry, and there was no malversation on the part of the presiding officer.

We will now suppose that the question as to the amount of the compensation has been finally decided, the title to the lands perfected (c), and that nothing remains but to recover the compensation from the company. We therefore proceed to consider what remedies may be resorted to, by the party entitled to receive the money awarded by the verdict of the jury, and the costs attending the inquiry.

Remedies to recover money awarded as compensation.

This question was very much discussed in the courts of law, when

(a) See Re Stroud, 8 C. B. 502, where the question was discussed but not decided as to the power of the Court to interfere with the award of an umpire under sect. 27.

it first became necessary to provide a remedy to recover compensation, under some of the earlier special railway acts. Some of these acts were altogether silent as to the mode in which the money awarded should be recovered. In other instances it was enacted, as has been already shown (d), that the inquisition, verdict and judgment should be enrolled by the clerk of the peace, and should be deemed records to all intents and purposes. The question soon arose, whether the proper mode of recovering money awarded as compensation was by action of debt—on the case—or debt upon the statute, or by an action of debt as upon a judgment of record,—or whether the only remedy was by indictment. All these modes of proceeding were suggested in an early case, as an answer to an application made for a mandamus to compel a company to pay a sum of money awarded as compensation. The Court of Queen's Bench, without determining that one or more of the before-mentioned remedies might not exist, determined, that, in the absence of any other clear remedy, they ought to issue a mandamus; and this was the mode of proceeding usually adopted to enforce the payment of compensation-money (e).

Action to recover
awarded by jury.

But the Courts having afterwards decided that an action of debt (f) may be brought on an inquisition and verdict, this proceeding has superseded the old remedy by mandamus. In such an action the plaintiff may recover not only the amount assessed for compensation, but also the costs attending the inquiry, if he is entitled to them, and they have been taxed (g). A more summary remedy is, however, provided by the statute to obtain the costs, by the following sections.

Costs of inquisition.

(h) These words include an inquiry before a jury instituted under sect. 68, and the claimant under that section is consequently entitled to his costs, if the jury give a larger sum than the company have previously offered. South-Eastern R. Co. v. Richardson, in error, 15 C. B. 810; 20 L. J. (C. P.) 122, affirming S. C. below, 11 C. B. 154; 20 L. J. (C. P.) 236, see ante, 199.

(i) Semble, that this refers to the sum offered previously to the ten days' notice of the time and place of holding the inquiry under sect. 46. Ross v. York, Newcastle and Berwick R. Co., 18 L. The inquisition need not show on its face by whom the costs are to be paid. Where a company were liable to pay costs to be recoverable before a justice, if the same sum or a larger sum than that previously offered were awarded to the party whose lands were taken, Williams, J., observed on this point, "It is suggested that the inquisition ought to show the facts which ascertained the liability to costs, but it is obvious that that is not so, because the costs are not a matter for the consideration of the jury: they are recovered by a proceeding quite independent of the inquiry, and there is no reason that anything respecting them should appear by the inquisition." R. v. Trustees of Swansea Harbour, 8 A & E. 439. See also previously offered by the promoters of the undertaking, all the costs of such inquiry (k) shall be borne by the promoters of the undertaking; but if the verdict of the jury be given for the same, or a less sum than the sum previously offered (l) by the promoters of the undertaking, or if the owner of the land shall have failed to appear at the time and place appointed for the inquiry, having received due notice thereof, one half of the costs of summoning, impannelling and returning the jury, and of taking the inquiry (m), and recording the verdict and judgment thereon, in case such verdict shall be taken, shall be defrayed by the owner of the lands, and the other half by the promoters of the undertaking; and each party shall bear his own costs, other than as aforesaid, incident to such inquiry.

By sect. 52, the costs of any such inquiry shall, in case of difference, be settled by one of the masters of the Court of Queen's the same point considered as to awards, ante, 294. Quære, whether the statute ought to have provided for the payment of the claimant's costs, in cases where the company have not previously made any offer of compensation. The company may perhaps altogether refuse to recognize a claim for compensation, and the claimant would then be entitled to require the company to issue a warrant under sect. 68 (post, App.; and see ante, 193). But in such a case it seems not to be incumbent on the company to make an offer of a certain sum for compensation, because it has been ruled that sect. 38 does not apply to cases falling under sect. 68, see ante, 199. In South-Eastern R. Co. v. Richardson, 21 L. J. (C. P.) 122, Alderson, B., seemed to be of opinion that if no offer was made, the verdict of the jury must be taken to be given for a greater sum than that previously offered. But in delivering the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, it is said, "It is not necessary for us to say what the decision would have been if no offer had been made by the company." See also Maher v. Southern and Western R. Co., 13 Ir. L. R. 364. It is quite clear that the power to recover such costs must be given by the statute expressly. In Corrigal v. London and Blackwall R. Co., 5 M. & G. 219, it was decided that a claimant was not entitled to the costs of an inquiry, because the act had only provided for three classes of cases, neither of which included the claimant's case. See also R. v. Same Co., 4 Railw. C. 119; Martin v. Leicester Waterworks Co., 27 L. J. (Exch.) 432.

(k) This means all the costs of such an inquiry as defined by sect. 52. Bray v. South-Eastern R. Co., 19 L. J. (Q. B.) 11; 7 D. & L. 307. It has been held under a special act, which gave "all the costs of the inquest," that those words meant all costs whatever, like the case of a trial where one party obtains a verdict. R. v. Justices of York, 1 A. & E. 828; 3 N. & M. 625;

R. v. Gardner, 6 A. & E. 112; 1 N. & P. 308; R. v. Sheriff of Warwickshire, 2 Railw. C. 661. In the two last cases, the words were narrower than those in the Lands Clauses Act, and the party was held not entitled to the general costs. Where the sheriff improperly refused to proceed on an inquiry, and the claimant afterwards obtained a mandamus, the company cannot be required to pay costs incurred in making the application against the sheriff. R. v. Sheriff of Middlesex, 5 Q. B. 365; 3 Railw. C. 396. In Re Hammersmith Rentcharge, 4 Exch. 87; 7 D. & L. 41; 19 L. J. (Exch.) 357; it was held (Parke, B., dissentiente), under 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 71, s. 82, which gives "costs of the inquisition," to the owner of a rentcharge, who is compelled to levy it by such a proceeding, that the owner was entitled to the costs of opposing a rule subsequently discharged which had been taken out by the tenant to set aside the order to hold the inquisition.

(l) Where a claimant, under sect. 68, claims one sum as compensation for premises having been injuriously affected, and another for loss of business, and the promoters offer one sum for the injurious affection, and another for the loss of business; and the jury gives the same aggregate amount, but apportion the sums differently, the claimant cannot get the costs of the inquiry. Hay v. Metropolitan R. Co., 33 L. J. (Q. B.) 73.

(m) Where the same amount as the company previously offered is given, the company are not entitled to any costs incurred upon the summoning and impanelling of the jury, nor, as costs "of taking the inquiry," to half their costs of counsel, attorney or witnesses. The intention of the legislature is to divide, between the parties, merely the formal costs of the proceedings, and to leave each party to bear his own costs, other than those. Bray v. South-Eastern R. Co., 19 L. J. (Q. B.) 11.

By sect. 53, if any such costs shall be payable by the promoters of the undertaking, and if within seven days after demand such costs be not paid to the party entitled to receive the same, they shall be recoverable by distress (o), and on application to any justice he shall issue his warrant accordingly; and if any such costs shall be payable by the owner of the lands, or of any interest therein, the same may be deducted and retained by the promoters of the undertaking out of any money awarded by the jury to such owner, or determined by the valuation of a surveyor under the provisions hereinafter contained; and the payment or deposit of the remainder, if any, of such money shall be deemed payment and satisfaction for the whole thereof, or if such costs shall exceed the amount of the money so awarded or determined, the excess shall be recoverable by distress, and on application to any justice he shall issue his warrant accordingly.

(n) The Master has no jurisdiction to tax costs incidental to railway inquiry as between solicitor and client, but only as between party and party. *O'Farrell v. Limerick and Waterford R. I. The Investment or Payment of Purchase-money and Compensation.

ALTHOUGH, as it has been shown (b), the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act enables tenants for life, and other persons under various disabilities, to sell and convey lands to a railway company, such parties are not entitled to take the purchase-money or compensation awarded or to be paid for the purchase of such lands, or for permanent damage thereto, for their own use, but it must be in such and some other cases invested for the benefit of the parties interested in the lands. The following are the provisions of the statute with respect to purchase-money or compensation coming to parties having limited interests, or prevented from treating, or not making title.

If the purchase-money or compensation payable in respect of any lands, or any interest therein, purchased or taken by the company from any corporation, tenant for life or in tail, married woman (c) seised in her own right and entitled to dower, guardian, committee of lunatic or idiot, trustee, executor or administrator, or person having a partial or qualified interest only in such lands, and not entitled to sell or convey the same, except under the provisions of the Railway Acts, or the compensation paid for any permanent damage to any such lands amount to or exceed the sum of 200*l.*, the same shall be paid into the Bank of England or Ireland, as the case may be, in the manner particularly prescribed, and the monies remain so deposited, until the same be applied (d) to some one or more (e) of the following purposes; that is to say,—

1. In the purchase or redemption of the land-tax (f), or the discharge of any debt or incumbrance affecting the land in respect of which such money shall have been paid, or affecting other lands settled therewith (g) to the same or the like uses, trusts, or purposes: or,

2. In the purchase of other lands (h) to be conveyed, limited and settled upon the like uses, trusts and purposes, and in the same manner as the lands, in respect of which such money shall have been paid, stood settled (i): or,

(d) As to the costs of such application, see post, p. 332, sect. 80.

(f) Where an act of Parliament authorized a company to purchase lands of tenants for life, &c., and directed that the purchase-money should be applied in redemption of land-tax upon other parts of the property unsold, it was decided that a tenant for life, who had redeemed the land-tax before the act, might reimburse himself out of the proceeds of the lands purchased of him by the company. Ex parte Northwick, 1 Y. & Coll. 166.

(g) If the lands of a municipal corporation are taken, the purchase-money may be devoted to payment of mortgage monies secured on other lands belonging to the same corporation. Ex parte Corporation of Cambridge, 5 Railw. C. 204; 6 Hare, 30; 12 Jur. 450. But although the money deposited may be laid out in the discharge of mortgages affecting other settled lands, Shadwell, V.C., was of opinion, under a statute similar to the above, that the company are not liable for costs consequent on paying off mortgages. Ex parte Earl of Hardwicke, 17 L. J. (Ch.) 422; 12 Jur. 508; 1 De G., M. & G. 297. See post, p. 336, as to that case. Nor are the company liable to pay the mortgagee's costs of appearing to consent to such a petition. Ex parte Yates, 12 Jur. 279.

(h) K. Bruce, V.C., doubted, In re Cann's Estate, 19 L. J. (Ch.) 376; 15 Jur. 3, whether the Court was authorized to order deposited money, arising from the sale of freehold property, to be invested in a copyhold estate; but, upon a representation that the Master had found that it was for the benefit of all parties interested, that the purchase should be made, he made the order as prayed. But in a subsequent case, he expressed doubts if he had acted rightly in Cann's case. Ex parte Macaulay, 23 L. J. (Ch.) 815; 23 L. T. 263, in which case he refused to allow the purchase-money of freeholds to be invested in leaseholds. See Re Liverpool Dock Acts, 1 Sim. N. S. 202; and post, p. 335, note (t). In another case the Lords Justices made an order for reinvestment in copyholds, where the greater part of the lands sold to the railway company was of a like tenure. Re Browne, 6 Railw. C. 733; 16 Jur. 158. Where lands forming part of a rectory had been purchased of a company and the money deposited, the rector presented a petition under sect. 69, praying that the fund in court might be applied to defray costs incurred in inclosing waste lands allotted to the rectory, under an inclosure act. Sir J. Romilly, M.R., on the authority of a case previously decided by Wigram, V.C., made the order. Ex parte Lockwood, 14 Beav. 158; and see Re Duke of Marlborough, 13 Jur. 738. The money will not be allowed to be invested in the purchase of an equity of redemption. Ex parte Craven, 17 L. J. (Ch.) 215, or on a mortgage, even for a temporary security. Ex parte Franklin, 1 De G. & S. 528.

(i) It has been decided under a special railway act, that, where money is in court to be laid out in lands to be settled "to the like uses," the Court will lend its aid to an advantageous purchase, beyond the amount of the money deposited, and will direct the extra costs to be paid out of the money in Court. Ex parte Newton, 4 Y. & Coll. 518; but see Ex parte Tetley, 4 Railw. C. 55; Ex parte Madon, id. 49; Ex parte Vicar of Clarbrough, 12 Jur. 239; and see as to the costs, post, 332. A small sum of money, directed to be laid out in lands, to be settled "to the like uses," was ordered to be applied in new buildings. Ex parte Shaw, 4 Y. & Coll. 506. In another case, in "lasting improvements." Ex parte Barrett, 19 L. J. (Ch.) 415; 15 Jur. 3. But Parker, V.C., said, the rule he laid down was, not to allow sums above 20*l.* to be so paid for new buildings or improvements: In re Bateman, 21 L. J. (Ch.) 691, and Re Lord Egremont, 12 Jur. 618. So where only 20*l.* 10*s.* remained, the Court refused to allow it to be devoted to the payment of the extra costs of the tenant for life. Ex parte Rector of Bredicott, 17 L. J. (Ch.) 414; 5 Railw. C. 209.

3. If such money shall be paid in respect of any buildings taken under the authority of the acts, or injured by the proximity of the works, or injured by the works, in removing or replacing such buildings, or substituting others in their stead (k), in such manner as the Court of Chancery shall direct: or,

Purposes to which purchase-money may be applied.

4. In payment to any party becoming absolutely entitled to such money (l).

By sect. 70, such money may be so applied, as aforesaid, upon an order of the Court of Chancery (m), made on the petition of the party Court will order investment on petition.

(k) It has been repeatedly held, that purchase or compensation money may be laid out in building. Thus, where a company took land belonging to a charity on which almshouses were erected, and paid into Court the sum awarded as compensation for the land and rebuilding the almshouses, Shadwell, V. C., ordered the money to be paid to the trustees of the charity, upon an undertaking to apply it in rebuilding the almshouses. Ex parte Thorner's Charity, 12 L. T. 266. Again, in Re Buckinghamshire R. Co., 14 Jur. 1065, Lord Cranworth, V. C., authorized the application of purchase-money to the alteration and improvement of almshouses. And in another case, Wood, V. C., upon the petition of the incumbent, ordered the purchase-money of glebe land belonging to a parsonage to be paid to the nominee of the archbishop, (under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 106, s. 66,) to be applied in building a vicarage house. Ex parte Incumbent of Whitfield, 2 Johns. & H. 610; 30 L. J. (Ch.) 816, post, p. 337. And in Re Wight's Estates, 6 Weekly Rep. 718, Wood, V. C., also allowed a tenant for life to receive 220*l.* upon an undertaking to lay it out, with 80*l.* of her own, in building labourers' cottages upon the estate. So in the following case. A testator by will settled houses in London and Norwood upon certain trusts. The houses in Norwood were purchased by a railway company and the money paid into Court. Afterwards the houses in London were condemned by the commissioners under the Metropolitan Building Act, whereupon the tenant for life rebuilt them, and applied to the Master of the Rolls for an order for payment to her of the purchase-money for the Norwood houses, which was less than the cost of rebuilding the London houses. He refused the order, but upon appeal the Lords Justices made it. Re Davies' Estate, 27 L. J. (Ch.) 712; 3 De G. & Jo. 144. And where a railway passed through a farm and divided it, so that the buildings could not be conveniently used for one part of the farm, Sir J. Romilly, M. R., held that compensation paid for damage might be applied in the erection of new buildings on that part of the farm which required them. Ex parte Milward, 29 L. J. (Ch.) 245; 27 Beav. 571. However, in Re Rudyerd's Estates, 6 Jur., N. S. 816, Stuart, V. C., refused to make an order for the application of part of the purchase-money towards the erection of a new farmhouse and buildings upon an estate which had been purchased with other part of the purchase-money, saying it was not the purchase of other lands, and could not be considered as a debt or incumbrance.

(l) Where lands were sold by agreement to a company, by a dean and chapter and their lessee, for a long term of years, for one entire sum of 1,760*l.*, and the whole of the purchase-money was paid into the Bank by the company, and the lessee afterwards petitioned the Court to apportion and pay him his share of the purchase-money, K. Bruce, V. C., said that he had too much doubt of the authority of the Court to apportion the money in such a case, to make it proper for him to be active in doing so, and he therefore refused to accede to the application. Ex parte Ward, 17 L. J. (Ch.) 249. (An order was afterwards taken by consent in this case, to the effect that the dividends should be paid to lessee for the residue of the term or until further order, without prejudice to any question, the lessee undertaking to pay the rent reserved by the lease.) Where by the terms of a special railway act the company were empowered to purchase lands belonging to the corporation of Lincoln, in which lands the freemen were interested, and the purchase-money was directed to be deposited and applied for the permanent benefit of the freemen, as the Court of Chancery should direct, Parker, V. C., declined to entertain a petition as to the application of the fund, until a public meeting of the freemen should have been convened, and a committee appointed on their behalf, who could instruct counsel to appear. Re Great Northern R. Co., 6 Railw. C. 738; 21 L. J. (Ch.) 621; 16 Jur. 756. When money is to be treated as real, and when as personal estate, post, p. 342, and see post, p. 329, note (x).

(m) Several points have been decided as to the practice of the Court in entertaining these petitions. The Court will direct a reference to the Master before a summary who would have been entitled to the rents and profits of the lands in respect of which such money shall have been deposited, and, until the money can be so applied, it may, upon the like order, be invested in the funds, or in government or real securities (n), and the interest, dividends and annual proceeds thereof paid to the party who would order is made. Thus where an application was made by the parish officers to have a sum of money, which had been paid into Court by a railway company, paid out to them for the purpose of buying other land, and erecting other buildings, in substitution of those taken by the company; K. Bruce, V. C., directed a reference to the Master. Ex parte Churchwardens of Bicester, 5 Railw. C. 205. So, per Shadwell, V. C., Ex parte Craven, 17 L. J. (Ch.) 215; Re Martin, 22 L. J. (Ch.) 248; 17 Jur. 30. And it has been decided that the Court will not, by one order, direct a reference as to the propriety of a proposed reinvestment, and as to title, and for the completion of the purchase, by payments to the vendors, and for taxation and payment of costs. After the Master has approved of the title and settled the conveyance, the matter must come again to the Court for approval and further directions. Ex parte Duckle, 16 Jur. 511, explaining Ex parte Metherell, 16 Jur. 72; 20 L. J. (Ch.) 629, where a contrary rule is erroneously supposed to have been laid down. But in some cases such applications have been granted when supported by proper affidavits, showing that the title to the lands about to be purchased has been approved by counsel, and the deeds verified, without a reference to the Master. See Ex parte Vicar of East Dereham, 21 L. J. (Ch.) 677, by Kindersley, V. C. Where a rector, who had presented a petition for investment, died pending the proceedings and the new rector consenting that the proceedings should go on, Parker, V. C., held that no supplemental order was necessary. Ex parte Rector of Lea, 21 L. J. (Ch.) 776. But in Williams' Chancery Practice, p. 348, the practice of the Court is thus stated:—"The 56th section of the New Procedure Act, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, directs that on all sales under the decree or order of the Court, an abstract of the title shall be laid before one of the conveyancing counsel. The same course is also taken on the reinvestment in land of monies which have been paid into Court, under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, as the purchase-monies for lands taken by railway companies. The Court requires first to be satisfied by affidavit, that the purchase proposed to be made is a fit and proper investment of the fund, and, having been satisfied by the evidence on that point, directs a note to be taken by the registrar, that the Court approves of the proposed purchase, and the petition for the reinvestment of the fund then stands over until the opinion of one of the conveyancing counsel, as to the title, is produced. No order of reference is drawn up. The particular conveyancing counsel, to whom the case is to go, is determined by a rota as settled by the General Order of the 16th of December, 1852, (see now Consolidated Orders, 1860, II.,) unless there is any special reason for deviating from that order of rotation. The fact of the approval of the title is required to be verified by affidavit, and upon that being done, the registrar takes a note that the Court is satisfied on the point of title, and the petition is ordered further to stand over that the conveyancing counsel may settle the draft conveyance. The Court will not make the order prospectively for payment of the money, on the purchase deed being settled by the conveyancing counsel, but the case must be mentioned again when the deed is prepared for execution. In re Caddick's Settlement, 9 Hare, App. p. ix.; Ex parte Rector of South Collingham, ib. p. xii. "The course on the reinvestment of monies which have been paid into court by a railway company, upon a compulsory taking of land is this. The proposed reinvestment having been sanctioned by the Court, and the title approved by the conveyancing counsel, an application is then made to the Court that the purchase-money may be paid out, upon the execution of the conveyance. The engrossment of the deed, as settled by the conveyancing counsel, duly verified by affidavit (9 Hare, lxxxv.), is then produced in Court, a blank being left for the insertion of the recital of the order of the Court, for the payment of the purchase-money. The order is then made—that upon completion of the engrossment by the insertion therein of a recital of the order of the Court, and upon due execution of the conveyance by all proper parties, verified by affidavit, the sum of £ be paid out to A. B. the vendor." Re Caddick's Settlement, 17 Jur. 84; 9 Hare, App. ix.; 22 L. J. (Ch.) 10. See also Re Martin, 22 L. J. (Ch.) 248.

(n) The Master having reported against the propriety of allowing money, as a general principle, to be invested on mortgage, K. Bruce, V. C., said, as he was doubtful on the point, he would not go against the decision of the Master. Ex parte Franklyn, 17 L. J. (Ch.) 166; 12 Jur. 642; 5 Railw. C. 206. In Ex parte Craven, 17 L. J. (Ch.) 215, Shadwell, V. C., refused a similar application.

for the time being have been entitled to the rents and profits of the lands (o).

When a tenant for life applies to the Court, upon petition, to have money re-invested in the purchase of other lands, in pursuance of the foregoing section, it is not necessary to serve notice of the petition upon the parties in remainder. Lord Cranworth, L. J., said on this subject:—

On a petition for re-investment, by tenant for life, notice need not be given to remainderman.

“Great difficulty might frequently occur where the parties in remainder are under disabilities. It would appear that the party intrusted to sell the property might be equally intrusted to select a proper re-investment, especially as such investment is required to be made with the sanction of the Master. I have inquired of the Registrar whether the practice has been to serve the cestuis que trust, and he says that it has not. When it appears therefore, as a matter of fact, that this practice has gone on for twenty years, and that no inconvenience has resulted from it, I am certainly not prepared to say that that practice should not be persevered in. Taking analogy and practice together, I think it inexpedient to interfere to change the course hitherto pursued in these matters.”

Sir K. Bruce, L. J., also said:—

“By way of security in cases of this description, there is the superintendence of the Master, the improbability of the tenant for life seeking to injure the inheritance, and, lastly, the presence of the railway company, which, if anything gross were done, and through supineness or collusion they should be held to have connived at it, they would probably be themselves treated upon the footing of trustees, and thus have to pay the money over again. For these reasons, I concur that the order may be made, as asked by this petition, without any service on the parties entitled in remainder under this will (p).”

(o) A railway company took some land which had been demised by a dean and chapter for twenty-one years on a beneficial lease. The company purchased the lessee's interest, and purchased the reversionary interest of the dean and chapter separately, and on a petition praying that this latter purchase-money might be invested, K. Bruce, V. C., directed the money to be invested in lands, and after providing for the payment of the rent reserved to the dean and chapter, if such a provision was necessary, he directed the remainder of the dividends to be accumulated, until the expiration of the twenty-one years, and added to the principal, and the order was taken in that form. Ex parte Dean and Chapter of Gloucester, 19 L. J. (Ch.) 400; 15 Jur. 239; and see Ex parte Rector of Lambeth, 4 Railw. C. 231. So where compensation was awarded to the bishop, in respect of the value of the reversion of church lands leased for lives, Sir G. Turner, V. C., ordered the money to be invested, and the dividends to be accumulated until either of the lives should die, inasmuch as the bishop for the time being was entitled to nothing, until the lease should become renewable. Ex parte Bishop of Winchester, 16 Jur. 648; and see Ex parte Archbishop of Canterbury, 2 De G. & S. 365. And where the lands taken were, with other lands, subject to the payment of an annuity by the owner, and the purchase-money was duly deposited, but no conveyance of the lands to the company had been executed in consequence of a dispute as to who were necessary parties to join, K. Bruce, V. C., ordered the dividends to be paid to the owner of the lands, and directed the company to pay the costs of his petition. Ex parte Cofield, 11 Jur. 1071. But if the annuitants join with the owner in a petition, the dividends will be ordered to be paid to the former. Re Lowndes, 20 L. J. (Ch.) 422. When a portion of the corpus of the fund will be ordered to be sold, to pay an annuitant, see Ex parte Wilkinson, 3 De G. & S. 633. Where lands were taken which belonged to the trustees of charities, under the Municipal Corporation Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76), the purchase-money was ordered to be invested, and the payment of the dividends to be made to any two of the trustees for the time being. Re Collin's Charity, 20 L. J. (Ch.) 168.

When parties having precarious interests apply, the order for payment is moulded accordingly.

Nor to the company.

Nor is it necessary, when an application is made to re-invest money deposited, to give notice of the petition to the company who paid in the money (q). And in a case in which the company were improperly served with notice, on a petition to have the dividends paid to the husband of one of the parties interested, K. Bruce, V.C., ordered the petitioners to pay the costs incurred by the company (r).

Sect. 73.

If the purchase-money or compensation exceed 20*l.*, and is less than 200*l.*, it may be either paid into the Bank, and applied for the above-mentioned purposes, or, with the approbation of the company, may be paid to two trustees nominated in the manner prescribed, to be by them applied to the same purposes. Any such sum, not exceeding 20*l.*, is payable to the parties who were entitled to the rents and profits of the land, for their own use; or in case of coverture, infancy, lunacy, or other incapacity of the parties, then for their use to their respective husbands, guardians, committees, or trustees.

And all sums of money exceeding 20*l.*, payable in respect of the taking, using or interfering with any lands, under a contract or agreement with any person not entitled to dispose of such lands, or of the interest therein contracted to be sold by him absolutely, for his own benefit, shall be paid into the Bank, or to trustees in manner aforesaid (s); and it shall not be lawful for any contracting party, not entitled as aforesaid, to retain to his own use any portion of the sums so agreed or contracted to be paid, for or in respect of the taking, using or interfering with any such lands, or in lieu of bridges, tunnels or other accommodation works, or for assenting to or not opposing the passing of the bill authorizing the taking of such lands; but all such monies shall be deemed to have been contracted to be paid for and on account of the several parties interested in such lands, as well in possession as in remainder, reversion, or expectancy: Provided always, that it shall be in the discretion of the Court of Chancery in England, or the Court of Exchequer in Ireland, or the said trustees, as the case may be, to allot to any tenant for life, or for any other partial or qualified estate, for his own use, a portion of the sum so paid into the Bank, or to such trustees as aforesaid, as compensation for any injury, inconvenience, or annoyance, which he may be considered to sustain, independently of the actual value of the lands to be taken, and of the damage occasioned to the lands held therewith, by reason of the taking of such lands and the making of the works (t).

(x) A testator, by his will, bequeathed a leasehold estate, determinable on his own life, and that of another person, to trustees, upon trust to one for life, with remainders over, and directed that his trustees should renew the lease by substituting another life for his own. A railway company took part of the estate, and the purchase-money was paid into Court and invested, and the dividends were ordered to be paid to the tenant for life. The trustees did not renew the lease, and the other life dropped. Stuart,

V. C., decided that the tenant for life was entitled to the principal of the stock in Court. His Honor said—"I am bound by the terms of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act to give to the party entitled in possession, the same benefit in respect of this fund as she would have been entitled to, in case the sale had not been made, and the money had not come into Court. There can be no doubt what that interest would have been. (z) Where a railway act empowered a company to summon a jury in cases where the owner of lands failed to disclose his title, and, an owner having failed to comply with the act in this particular, a jury was summoned, and the amount of compensation assessed, whereupon the company, without calling upon the owner to produce his title, paid the amount of the compensation into the Bank, in pursuance of a clause in the railway act, similar in its terms to the above, and took possession of the lands; it was held by the Court of Exchequer, that the company were not authorized to take this step. Lord Cranworth observed—"It is clear that the object of this act was to enable the parties, claiming compensation for their lands, to make out their title, after the jury had assessed the amount of that compensation. Here an offer was made by the company, which the plaintiff treats as a nullity; on which the company, who want the land for their works, apply to a jury to assess the compensation, and it is assessed accordingly. Now, after that was done, they were bound to call on him to show his title; and until they do so, they have no right to take possession of his land by paying the amount of the compensation money into Chancery. Neither the letter nor the spirit of the act bears out such a construction, and it would be most unjust if it did." Doe v. Manchester, Bury and Rossendale R. Co., 14 M. & W. 687; 9 Jur. 949; 15 L. 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18,

s. 77, App. 58.

Upon the application by petition of any party making claim to the money so deposited as last aforesaid, or any part thereof, or to the lands in respect whereof the same shall have been so deposited, or any part of such lands, or any interest in the same, the said Court of Chancery in England, or the Court of Exchequer in Ireland, may, in a summary way, as to such Court shall seem fit, order such money to be laid out or invested in the public funds, or may order distribution thereof, or payment of the dividends thereof(a), according to the respective estates, titles or interests of the parties making claim to such money or lands, or any part thereof, and may make such other order in the premises as to such Court shall seem fit(b).

Application of monies so deposited.

Sect. 78.

(a) Applications for payment of dividends are now made in chambers. Cons. Ord. 1860, xxxv. 1.

(b) In an early case, Ex parte Grainge, 3 Y. & Col. 62, where money had been deposited in consequence of a defect in the title to the lands, which being removed, a petition was presented, praying that the money might be paid over to the petitioner, the affidavit stated that the petitioner was not aware of any right in any other person, or of any claim made by any other person to the money so paid into the Bank, or to the land: Alderson, B., observed, that there were great objections to such an application as the present, as it was obvious that the party applying for the money might have a very limited interest in the lands. He, however, would consider himself bound by the decisions of other judges, and would therefore examine the orders which had been made in the cases cited, and deliver his opinion on a future day. But, on a subsequent day, his lordship said, that he had examined the orders made by former judges, and that, upon the authority of those orders, he felt himself bound to accede to the application. A similar application was afterwards made, In re Birmingham and Gloucester R. Act, 3 Y. & C. 66 n. (b), there being no other evidence of the title of the lands than the applicant's affidavit. Upon that occasion, the same learned judge said, "I am bound by the authorities, though I do not comprehend them. The party may sell to the company lands in strict settlement, and then apply for the money out of court.

However, the order must be made." And see Ex parte Shears, 2 Y. & J. 493. And if it appears to the Court of Equity, when a petition is presented, that there is a dispute respecting the title of the petitioner, it seems to be the practice to direct an issue to determine the question. Ex parte Issauchaud, 3 Y. & Coll. 721. As to whether an incumbrancer may apply by petition under the above statute, see Ex parte Back, 2 Y. & Jer. 386. Since the foregoing cases were decided, the following order has been issued in Chancery. Consol. Ord. 1860, xxxiv. 3.—"In the case of petitions under acts of Parliament, authorizing the sale of property for public purposes, where the purchase-money is directed by any such act of Parliament to be paid into Court, the petitioners claiming to be entitled to the money so paid in must make an affidavit not only verifying their title, but also stating that they are not aware of any right in any other person, or of any claim made by any other person, to the sum of £ — in the said petition mentioned, or to any part thereof; or if the petitioners are aware of any such right or claim, they must, in such affidavit, state or refer to and except the same." But it seems that this order is only applicable to petitions for payment of capital or principal, and does not apply to applications for payment of dividends to tenants for life or others. Re Baroness Braye, 22 L. J. (Ch.) 285; 9 Hare, App. vii.; Ex parte Hollick, 16 L. J. (Ch.) 71; 4 Railw. C. 498, contra. A railway company took possession of land under their Parties in possession to be treated as owners of lands.

8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, s. 79, App. 58.

If any question arise respecting the title to the lands in respect whereof such monies shall have been so paid or deposited as aforesaid, the parties respectively in possession of such lands, as being the owners thereof, or in receipt of the rents of such lands, as being entitled thereto at the time of such lands being purchased or taken, shall be deemed to have been lawfully entitled to such lands, until the contrary be shown to the satisfaction of the Court (c); and, unless the contrary be shown as aforesaid, the parties so in possession, and all parties claiming under them, or consistently with their possession, shall be deemed entitled to the money so deposited, and to the dividends or interest of the annuities or securities purchased therewith, and the same shall be paid and applied accordingly.

II. Costs attending the Investment of Monies.

8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, s. 80, App. 58.

The Lands Clauses Act contains an important provision, which requires the company to pay all the costs relating to the investment of monies paid into the Bank, and the subsequent proceedings relating thereto.

Costs in cases of money deposited.

By sect. 80, in all cases of monies deposited in the Bank under the provisions of that or the special act, or an act incorporated therewith (d), (except where such monies shall have been so deposited by reason of the wilful refusal (e) of any party entitled thereto to receive the same, or to convey or release the lands in respect whereof the same shall be payable, or by reason of the wilful neglect of any party compulsory powers, but previously to the payment of the price, they entered into an agreement for purchase with persons who alleged that they had a good title, and that they could convey free from incumbrances, and the consideration money was fixed at an entire sum for the whole. It afterwards appearing that the alleged owners of the whole could only make out their title to a part, the company paid the entire sum into Court, under sect. 69; this sum was apportioned, and the value of the land, to which a good title could be made, was stated by affidavit. The vendors then presented a petition, praying that the sum apportioned to them might be carried over to a separate account, and that the dividends might be paid to the tenant for life. Stuart, V. C., ordered the sum apportioned as the value of that part of the land to which a good title could be made to be carried over to the account of the petitioners, and the dividends to be paid to them, the principal not to be paid out without notice to the company. Re Perkes, 7 Railw. C. 605. Where a railway company took real property vested in trustees for married women and children, the Court declined to direct the fund to be paid to the trustees, but ordered it to be invested in the ordinary way. Re Horwood's Estate, 3 Giff. 218.

(c) This section seems to be intended only as a direction to the Court of Equity, how it should act in any case in which it should be unable to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion as to the parties entitled to receive the money; but if the court directs an issue at law, it would be a misdirection, if the jury were directed to the provisions of this section, as confirmatory of the title of the parties in possession of the land. Per Kindersley, V. C.: Freemen of Sunderland v. Bishop of Durham, 16 Jur. 370; S. C., 21 L. J. (Ch.) 145.

(d) Re Ellison, 25 L. J. (Ch.) 379; 8 De Gex, M. & G. 62.

(e) A refusal founded upon an opinion of counsel that the party was not bound to convey the land, is not a wilful refusal; it must be a refusal arising from mere will or caprice, and not the exercise of reason. Ex parte Bradshaw, 16 Sim. 174; 12 Jur. 888; Re Windsor, Staines and South-Western R. Co., 12 Beav. 522; Ex parte Railstone, 15 Jur. 1028; Ex parte Dashwood, 26 L. J. (Ch.) 299.

Where a company was empowered by the special act to take lands belonging to a vicarage, and it was declared that the purchase-money should be paid into Court, and that, on a petition by the vicar and patron, and with the consent of the ordinary, it might be laid out in the purchase of other lands, and a purchase was made accordingly:—Parker, V. C., decided, that the bishop was entitled to receive from the company, not only the costs of his attendance in the Master's Office, but also of his appearance on the usual petitions to the Court. Ex parte Vicar of Chreech St. Michael, 21 L. J. (Ch.) 677. When money has been re-invested in other lands, the extent to which companies are liable to the costs of acquiring a good title to the purchased lands, under various special acts, differing in some respects from the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, is considered in Jones v. Lewis, 11 Jur. 511; Re Strachan's Estate, 9 Hare, 185.

C., said, he would not refuse certain costs, which the company objected to pay in consequence of the introduction into the petition of a verbatim copy of various sections of the Consolidation and Railway Acts. His Honor said, the practice of making such insertions was liable to much abuse, but he could not lay down the rule contended for on behalf of the company. But see Re Manchester R. Co., 8 Hare, 31. Where an order for costs omitted the usual words, excepting costs of adverse litigation, the Lords Justices, upon appeal, ordered their insertion. Re Cant's Estate, 29 L. J. (Ch.) 119; 6 Jur. (N. *Costs in Cases of

Under this section therefore it seems that the company (q) are liable to pay the costs, including therein all reasonable charges and expenses incident thereto, of the following matters:—

1. Of the purchase or taking of the lands, or which have been incurred in consequence thereof, other than such costs as are by the act otherwise provided for.
2. Of the investment in government or real securities of all monies deposited in the Bank under the Lands Clauses or special act (except in certain special cases, see the section, ante, p. 332).
3. Of the re-investment thereof in the purchase of other lands.
4. Of obtaining proper orders for any of the purposes aforesaid.
5. Of orders for the payment of the dividends and interest of the securities whereon the monies are invested (r).
6. Of orders for the payment out of Court of the principal of such monies, or of the securities whereon the same shall be invested, and of all proceedings relating thereto, except such as are occasioned by litigation between adverse claimants.

The cases upon 1, 2, 4 and 5 of these divisions of the subject have been already mentioned in the notes, but those upon 3 and 6 appear to require a more lengthened notice.

First, as to the third of the above divisions, viz., as to the costs of re-investment. It will have been observed that sect. 69 (s) authorizes the application of purchase-money or compensation to some one or more of four different purposes, viz.—

Costs of re-investment.

1. Purchase or redemption of land tax or discharge of debts or incumbrances (t);
2. Purchase of other lands;

And in Re St. Bartholomew's Hospital, 4 Drew. 425, where the purchase-money had originally been only 1,056*l.*, Kindersley, V. C., allowed the costs of a third re-investment of a portion which did not exhaust the fund. Costs in Cases of Money deposited.

3. Buildings;

4. Payment to person entitled absolutely ;

whilst this part of sect. 80 now under consideration only throws upon the company the costs of (2) re-investment in the purchase of other lands. It would seem therefore to be clear, independently of authority, that in the event of the Court authorizing an application of monies to (1) the purchase or redemption of land tax or the discharge of debts, or to (3) buildings, or to (4) payment to a person absolutely entitled, the costs of such re-investment (apart of course from the costs of payment of the money out of Court, of which presently) ought not to be thrown upon the company; and accordingly we find it decided that where the money is applied to the discharge of debts or incumbrances (u), or in the erection, alteration or improvement of buildings (x), only the costs of the petition for payment of the money out of Court have been thrown upon the company. But in one case (y) Sir J. Romilly, M. R., made the company pay the costs where the money was applied in redeeming land tax, saying:—

“This case comes within the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, and the application of the purchase-money to the redemption of the land tax is a re-investment within the meaning of sect. 80. The costs of it are therefore payable by the railway company. The two cases, Re Buckinghamshire R. Co. (z) and Ex parte Hardwicke, which were cited, do not apply; for in the former the application was for the investment of purchase-money in alteration of almshouses, and it is therefore clearly distinguishable from the present case, and will not conflict with my present decision; and as to the latter case, it appears not have been decided upon the Lands Clauses Act at all, but upon the special act, and it is therefore no authority in the present case.”

In a subsequent case (a), however, his Honor, in authorizing the application of compensation-money to the erection of new buildings, refused to fix the company with the costs of the petition, saying the point was settled by Re Buckinghamshire R. Co., and the costs must come out of the fund in Court. This latter case therefore seems to be somewhat at variance with the former, and more in accordance with previous decisions. But in neither of the two last-mentioned cases, nor in Re Buckinghamshire R. Co., does the attention of the Court appear to have been called to that part of sect. 80 which appears clearly and justly to throw upon the company in all cases the costs of an order for the payment of the principal out of Court (b), as distinct from the costs of re-investment, a distinction which appears from the reports frequently to have been lost sight of. But, in a later case (c) before Wood, V. C., in which he ordered the purchase-money of glebe land to be paid to the incumbent, to be applied in building a vicarage house, this part of sect. 80 appears to have been more prominently brought before the Court, and accordingly he fixed the company with the costs of the petition (d), saying:—

*Costs in Cases of Money deposited.
Ex parte Whit-

“An order for the application of railway money in permanently improving buildings, was made by Lord Cranworth in the case of the Buckinghamshire Railway, though the costs were not there given. With respect to the costs, I think the language of sect. 80 is sufficiently wide to cover the case. The 69th section contains an enumeration of the different modes in which money paid into the Bank by a railway company may be applied. All these particulars are not repeated in extenso in sect. 80, which provides for the costs. This section, however, does make the costs of the orders for the payment out of Court of the principal monies payable by the company.

“There is a case before Shadwell, V. C., in which it seems to have been held, that, although the petition was for the application of the money in restoring buildings which it was necessary to pull down in consequence of the operations of the company, costs were nevertheless payable by the company. The case is the stronger, because there the Court exercised the special power given by the 69th section, of applying the fund in replacing permanent buildings, and did not act under that portion of the clause which directs re-investments in land. There is an omission of any express provision in sect. 80 for the costs of applying money in renewing injured buildings, and it was only on the equity of the statute that the costs were allowed. It seems to follow à fortiori that the Court, taking the step which it is asked to take here, and treating the proposed application of the money as an investment in land, (which is within the words of sect. 80,) must follow the principle as to costs which was acted upon in that case.

“The costs would be payable by the company, if the money were actually laid out on land. The proposed building is, in my opinion, an investment authorized by the statute, and the case further falls within the words of sect. 80, ‘the costs of orders for the payment of principal out of Court.’ Having regard, therefore, to the fact that the object of the statute was to throw upon the company all the costs occasioned by taking land without the consent of the owner, and that very large words were introduced into the statute to supply the defects which had been found in analogous provisions of earlier acts, I am of opinion that the company must pay the costs of the petition and of the payment out of the money.”

Where the lands, &c., purchased are “conveyed, limited and settled upon the like uses, trusts and purposes, and in the same manner as the lands in respect of which the money was paid stood settled,” under sect. 69, it is held that, upon the equity of the statute, the company are liable to pay the costs of such re-settlement.

of the application for re-investment, Kindersley, V. C., refused to make the company pay the costs of the re-investment, but, upon appeal, the Lords Justices varied the order and threw the costs on the company (e).

Whether owner in fee can claim costs of re-investment.

It is believed, that it has never yet been decided whether an owner in fee can claim the costs of a re-investment. But Lord Justice Turner in one case (f) intimated an opinion that he could, and, in a subsequent case (g), Kindersley, V. C., seemed disposed to follow that intimation. But in neither of those cases was it necessary to decide the point. Such costs seem clearly within the words of sect. 80.

Payment of principal money out of court.

Secondly, as to the sixth of the above (h) divisions, viz., as to the costs of the payment out of Court of the principal monies. The act seems in all cases to throw these costs upon the company, in what manner soever the money may be applied when paid out, except where there is litigation between adverse claimants. Upon this exception there have been numerous cases, the result of which is thus stated by Kindersley, V. C., in Haynes v. Barton (i).

Where there are adverse claimants.

Haynes v. Barton.

"The question upon this petition is, as to what costs must be paid by the railway company, who have taken certain lands for the purposes of their railway and paid the purchase-money into Court, and this petition is presented for the payment of such money out of Court. The petition is entitled not only in the matter of the act, but also in the cause. I have looked into the cases, and I find, that, though they are not precisely uniform, still there is a principle which is apparent in all. The cases which seem to me to bear chiefly on the question are, first, Dinning v. Henderson (j), which came before Knight Bruce, L. J., when V. C. In that case, a devisee in trust, who was the surviving plaintiff in the cause, agreed to sell to a railway company a portion of the testator's estate, under the Lands Clauses Act. The purchase-money was paid into Court in the matter of the act, and the plaintiff presented a petition in the cause and in the matter of the act, to have it transferred to the credit of the cause, and asked that the company might pay to the petitioner and the other parties in the cause their costs of and incident to and consequent on the application. The V. C. said, that sect. 80 of the Lands Clauses Act required a liberal interpretation to be put upon it, and directed the company to pay the costs as prayed. In that case, therefore, the V. C. seemed to consider, that, upon the true construction of the act, the company was bound to pay the costs of the parties in the suit. The next case came before Lord Langdale in 1848, Re Hull and Selby R. Co. (k). There a petition was presented by two of the parties to a suit, claiming to be entitled to 1,880*l.* paid into Court, in the matter of the act, by the company, as compensation for land taken by them, praying that the fund might be transferred to the credit of the suit and invested, and that the company might pay the costs, charges and expenses of all parties of and relating to the application. The parties were numerous, and some appeared by different counsel. Lord Langdale said, 'I have often had occasion to observe on the powers conferred by the legislature on these companies, by which they are enabled to take away any man's land from him by force, whether he will or not, without giving him a voice in the matter. The laws then are bound to protect individuals whose rights are invaded for the public good against these companies, and if persons are put to expense by having their land taken away from them by those extraordinary powers, it surely would be unreasonable that they should be obliged to bear that expense.' And an order was made according to the prayer. The next case was Re Taylor (l), before Lord Cottenham. In that case, the committee of a lunatic contracted with the company, under the authority of the act, for sale of part of the lunatic's estate, and the purchase-money was paid into Court in the matter of the act. The committee presented a petition to have the money invested, but the L. C. said it was necessary to have a reference to the master, to inquire whether the contract was proper and beneficial, having regard to the authority given by the act, and he ordered accordingly. The master having reported in favour of the contract, the committee presented a petition to confirm the master's report, that the petitioner might be at liberty to convey, for payment of interest on the purchase-money for investment, and that the costs of the petitioner of and incidental to the conveyance and investigation, deduction and verification of the title, and of obtaining and prosecuting the reference, and of the petition and of the order to be made thereon, should be paid by the company; and the L. C. said, it was quite clear that the company must pay the costs in question, the reference being rendered necessary in consequence of the purchase. That, therefore, is a clear authority on the subject.

"The next case was Picard v. Mitchell (m), before the Master of the Rolls. The suit was an administration suit, and the company served the usual notice to treat for some of the testator's land. An order was made on a petition in the suit for a reference, to inquire whether it would be most for the benefit of those parties who were infants and married women, that the company should be required to take the whole property, and to determine by which of the modes the compensation ought to be ascertained. After proceedings before the master, the compensation was determined by arbitration, and the money paid into Court; and the petition on which the question arose was presented in the matter of the act and in the cause, praying that the company might pay to the petitioners, and the plaintiffs and the defendants in the cause, their just costs, charges and expenses of and incidental to taking the land, and of and incidental to the former petition and the reference to the master, and of the reference to the arbitrators, and of the agreement of reference, and of that application and of the conveyance, and an order was made according to the prayer. In that case, Lord Langdale said, that, prima facie, all the expenses ought to be paid by the company who have occasioned them, and added, 'Where public companies, either for the public good or their private profit, come and violently take the property of others, whether they like it or not, they ought to indemnify the persons against all the expenses which may be occasioned by such a proceeding.' The four cases I have referred to are clear and strong upon the subject, and they decide that the company must pay all the costs occasioned by their taking the lands. Then came Hore v. Smith (n), before Knight Bruce, L. J., when V. C., who had, in the case I have already referred to, made the company pay all the costs. In Hore v. Smith, the V. C. took a different view, but no cases were cited on that occasion. I do not know whether there were any special circumstances in the case, but at all events none appear in the report. That petition was presented in the cause and in the matter of the act, for payment to the petitioner (who was an annuitant upon certain lands the subject of the suit) of money which had been paid into Court, in the matter of the act, by the company, for land taken by them. The master had found that considerable sums were due to the petitioner for arrears on his annuity, and the petition prayed that the money might be paid to him, and that the company might pay all reasonable charges and expenses of and incident to the application and consequent thereon, and all other charges and expenses properly payable by the company under their act in respect of land taken by them. That was a case under a private act, but the clause in that act relating to costs is precisely the same as sect. 80 of the Lands Clauses Act, and Knight Bruce, V. C., said that the company must pay only such costs as they would have paid if the petition had been presented simply in the matter of the act and not in the cause; and the costs of the defendants, the parties to the cause, must be costs in the cause. As I have said, I do not know whether there were any special circumstances in that case; but at all events, Knight Bruce, L. J., seems to have considered that the company need only pay the costs under the act, and this decision seems contrary to his former decision in Dinning v. Henderson. The next case is Patten v. Gally (o), before Turner, L. J., when V. C. In that case real estate was devised to one for life, with remainder to trustees for sale, with power to give receipts and discharges. Part of the estate was taken by the E. C. Railway Company for the purposes of their railway, and the purchase-money was paid into Court under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act. After A.'s death a suit was instituted for the administration of the estate of the testator, and, on that suit coming on upon further directions, a petition was presented by one of the parties on the record, praying to have the fund carried over to the credit of the cause, and therefore it was presented in the cause and in the act, and came on to be heard with the cause, and had been served on the trustees for sale and on all the other parties in the cause, several of whom appeared. The master had found that the proceeds of part of the property would consist of the fund, the subject-matter of the application. The different parties who appeared asked that their costs might be paid by the company. Four counsel appeared for the different parties to the suit, and the counsel for the company cited Re Hore's Estate, and suggested that the money might have been paid to the trustees on their application after the death of A., prior to the institution of the suit, without service on any other party, the sale being necessary. Turner, V. C., however, held, that the costs could not be separated, and that the costs of all parties served must be paid by the company according to the act; so that notwithstanding the case of Hore's Estate, he held that the company must pay all the costs. The next case is Carpmael v. Proffitt (p), which, though not precisely the same case as the present, is analogous to it. The petitioner's land in that case was taken by a railway company, and the purchase-money paid into Court in the matter of the railway company's act. The petitioner then agreed for the purchase of other land which was sold in a suit. On the petition in the matter of the act there was the usual evidence as to title, which, having been approved, the petitioner presented his petition in the cause, and in the matter of the act, to carry out the purchase; and Wood, V. C., made the company pay the costs of both petitions, including (as I think is apparent) the costs of the parties to the suit. In Melling v. Bird (q), which came before me in 1853, a suit had been instituted for the administration of the estate of a testator who had devised lands in trust for sale; the company had taken part of the estate and paid the purchase-money into Court in the usual way. The plaintiffs, who were entitled to one-tenth of the testator's estate, presented a petition in the cause and in the matter of the act, for a transfer of the fund to the credit of the cause, and served the trustees and the parties entitled to the other nine-tenths, who appeared by four different solicitors; and it appeared to me that the company was bound to pay the costs of all parties properly served, but that it was oppressive for the parties to appear in the way they had done, and which had thrown unnecessary costs on the company, and therefore, although I made the company pay the costs of the trustees, I refused to make them pay the costs of the other parties interested in the nine-tenths, who had the same interest as the petitioners. In that case, therefore, I upheld the principle, but refused the costs on another ground, namely, because they had severed in their appearance. The next case is Re Pickton's Estate (r). In that case the petitioner was tenant for life of property which had been charged by settlement with 3,200*l.* in favour of other persons, and the petitioner had filed a bill praying that the sums charged on the estate by the settlement, and the debts due from the testator under whose will the petitioner was tenant for life, might be raised by sale or mortgage of the estate. A decree was made directing a sale or mortgage of a sufficient part of the property to satisfy the charges thereon. Before the suit the company had taken a portion of the property and paid the purchase-money into Court, and the petition prayed that the money might be carried to the credit of the cause; and Wood, V. C., referring to Melling v. Bird, said the principle of that case was the correct one, and gave the trustees their costs, but refused the costs to the other parties, ordering that such costs might be costs in the cause; but he seems to have considered that I refused the costs in Melling v. Bird, not on the ground that they had unnecessarily increased the expense, but that such costs should not be paid by the company at all. The last case to which I must refer is Wilson v. Foster (s). In that case a suit had been instituted to administer the estate of Sir H. Wilson, under whose will Mrs. W. was tenant for life of real estate, with remainders over. A railway company had taken part of the land, and paid the purchase-money into Court in the usual way. A petition was presented by the tenant for life in the suit and in the matter of the act, for re-investment in land of part of the money. The remaindermen and trustees were served with the petition. Now in all the cases to which I have referred, the judges had made the company pay the costs of all parties, but the Master of the Rolls said—'I am of opinion that the company cannot be required to pay the costs of the remaindermen or of the trustees; I concur in the decision in Hore's Estate, and I am also of opinion that on applications for the re-investment of compensation money in land the parties ought to join in the petition, which they might have done under the act, if not in the cause, but the trustees and the remaindermen who approved of this purchase and of the investment in land ought not to have appeared as respondents, and I cannot require the company to pay their costs. The company must pay all the costs of the petitioner, and the costs of serving the other parties with the petition, but not the costs of the appearance of the remaindermen and of the trustees, which, in my opinion, was unnecessary. All that was necessary was an affidavit of service on them. The extra costs may be paid out of the fund in Court.' The effect of that case is that it was necessary to present the petition in the cause as well as in the act, and therefore necessary to serve the other parties, but they ought not to have appeared, and therefore the company ought not to pay their costs; in that respect only is there any variation between this case and those I have already referred to. These are the cases in which a petition has been presented not only in the matter of the act but also in a cause; and it appears to me that the current of authorities is strongly in favour of the company being required to pay the costs, not only of the petitioner but of the other parties whom it is necessary to serve. If, indeed, the parties appear in such a manner, as they did in Melling v. Bird, as to create unnecessary expense, the company will not be required to pay such unnecessary expenses, but that is an exception to the general rule that the company must pay the costs of all parties which have been rendered necessary through the company's taking the land; and I must say I fully concur in the opinion expressed by Lord Langdale, that if companies are armed with the power of taking land, they must be made to pay all the expenses occasioned by their doing so. The exception in the 80th section of the act is that the company cannot be made to pay any costs occasioned by adverse litigation, but this is the only exception to the general principle I have just stated. Apply that principle to the present case. This is a petition presented by trustees (there being a suit), asking for the re-investment in land of the money, or part of it, which has been paid into Court by the company, and that the dividends may be paid to the tenant for life. The petition was served on the tenant for life and remainderman, and he appears. Now it seems to me that, being presented in the cause as well as in the matter of the act, they were properly served, and they have not appeared in such a way as to make their appearance oppressive, and therefore I think their costs must be paid by the company. But there was a former petition which was presented for the purpose of obtaining the direction of the Court as to the course to be taken with reference to the notice to treat served by the company. The company offered a certain sum for the property, but it was thought the land was worth more. The result is as to the costs of the former petition, applying the principle laid down in Taylor's case and in Picard v. Mitchell, that those costs having been occasioned by the company taking the land should be paid by them. The only remaining question is, whether the company should pay the costs occasioned by their taking possession of the property before the agreement was entered into and without paying the compensation money into Court. That was a wrongful act on their part, and it became necessary to take certain proceedings in consequence of it, which were afterwards rendered unnecessary by the company paying the 850*l.* into Court. I do not think I can order the company to pay these costs, as they are not costs of proceedings under the act which I can deal with upon the present petition. I apprehend, however, that the parties may get them out of the suit, but I cannot now make the company pay those costs."

III. Whether Money deposited is to be treated as Real or Personal Estate.

Whether money deposited is real or personal estate.

An important question has been discussed, upon which the authorities are not perhaps quite uniform, as to whether money deposited by companies who have taken or purchased lands, under the compulsory powers of their acts, is to be treated as money, or personal estate impressed with the trusts of real estate—money-land as it is sometimes called.

Under sect. 76,

The only principle deducible from the cases is, that where the matter comes under sect. 69 of the Lands Clauses Act, the money remains impressed with the character of real estate; and when it comes under sect. 76, the money goes as personalty (t). In Cross's case (u), before Lord Cranworth, V. C., where the determination was that it came under sect. 76, it was decided, that money deposited for the purchase of freehold land taken under the Lands Clauses Act from an owner who was in a state of mental imbecility, and who continued in that state until his death, but who was not the subject of a commission of lunacy, could not after his death be considered as subject to the trusts of a will made before he became incompetent, and whereby he had devised his real estates, but that his executors were entitled to it, and an order was made accordingly.

But in another case (x) where real estate, settled on marriage upon trusts for sale, on the request of husband and wife, or the survivor, was taken by the corporation of London under the compulsory powers in the London Bridge Acts, without any conveyance by the trustees, and the value of the land was assessed by a jury and paid into Court, and, on petition of the trustees, invested in consols upon the trusts of the settlement,—Turner, V. C., decided, that under these circumstances, there was no conversion of the real estate into personalty, the case being under sect. 69.

realty.

So where a landowner (y), having land within the limits of deviation, entered into an agreement with a company, that in case they should construct their railway under their act, they should pay him a certain sum per acre for such of his land as they should require; and after his death the company took five acres of his land, and paid the purchase-money into Court, and the devisee of the estate on which the railway had been constructed, having petitioned to have the money paid to him, the petition being opposed by the executors, Kindersley, V. C., decided that the case was under sect. 69, and the contract did not operate as a conversion of the purchase-money into personal estate, but it formed a portion of the testator's real estate at the time of his death, and continued to retain that character afterwards. His Honor said:—

Re Walker.

“Without adverting to the other points which have been discussed, or referring to the decisions in the earlier cases, which, I must be permitted to say, are most unsatisfactory (z); but, assuming that I should be obliged to follow them in a similar case, still this does not seem to me to come within the authorities cited. The real meaning of the contract is this: that the company, having power to take the lands compulsorily from the owner at any time within the period allowed by the act, did not ask him to sell, but they wished to have the price defined, in case they required the property, and a sum per acre was fixed upon between the parties. Without using these precise words, it is evident that such was the meaning of the agreement. It referred to the fact that some of the land was included within the limits of deviation, but it was uncertain what portion would be required. If, however, the company did construct their line within the limits of deviation, and required any of the owner's land, they were to pay for it, at that rate per acre. The effect, therefore, was not that the owner contracted to sell, but that he gave the company permission to have the land at a specified price. It appears to me, upon these grounds, that the money which has been paid into Court does not constitute part of the personal estate of the testator, but formed a portion of his real estate at the time of his death, and continued to retain that character afterwards; and that it now belongs to the parties entitled to the real estate."

Re Stewart.

Again (a), where lands settled on one for life, with remainder to her children, with remainder over to B. in default of children, in fee, were taken under the authority of a Railway Act, which contained the usual compulsory clauses, and the purchase-money was paid into Court, and invested in consols, and the dividends were ordered to be paid to the tenant for life, who afterwards died without children, and B. afterwards also died, having done no act in his lifetime showing any intention to treat the consols as personal estate: Stuart, V. C., decided that the consols were to be treated as the real, and not as the personal, estate of B. His Honor said:—

"In support of the argument that the property had been converted into personal estate, Cross's case (b) has been cited, and I must say, that, although that case does not go to the whole extent of the principle here contended for, it does countenance the argument. Against that authority, other cases have been cited; and to the principle of these decisions I entirely accede. I think that where money has been paid into Court, by reason of real estate having been taken under the compulsory powers of one of these acts, and remains in Court, it is to be considered as money or personal estate in the hands of this Court, impressed with the trusts of real estate. That is a sound principle; and there must be strong words in the act to induce the Court to act on the assumption that it is personalty. Therefore it seems to me clear, upon authority and principle, that the money in Court in this case is to be considered, for the purpose of the question as to who was entitled to it, as real estate" (c).

Upon similar principles, Kindersley, V. C., held purchase-money of land belonging to a felon, who returned after seven years' transportation, remained impressed with the character of real estate, and was not forfeited to the Crown (d). Where the land was entailed, the money must be disentailed before the parties can get it (e).

IV. The Title to and Conveyance of Lands purchased.

When lands are purchased by the company by agreement, or are taken under the compulsory powers contained in the special act, the owner or other party entitled to sell or convey the lands is required to make out a good title (f); and it is usual to deliver an abstract of the title to the company (g), as in the case of an ordinary sale of lands. The owner is also required to execute a conveyance to the company. We have already seen that the Lands Clauses Act provides for the inconvenience which would result by the neglect or inability of the party to perfect the title and make the conveyance, by authorizing the company to execute a deed-poll, and thereupon, in certain cases, all the estate and interest in the lands vest absolutely in the company, without any further act being done by the vendor (h).

Vendor delivers an abstract of his title.

Special provisions are also inserted, to enable the company to take a conveyance of copyholds—common lands—waste lands—and lands in mortgage—and to release lands from existing charges. As to lands of copyhold or customary tenure (i) it is provided by the Lands Clauses Act, that every conveyance of such lands to the company shall be entered on the rolls of the manor, and on payment to the steward of the manor of such fees as would be due to him on the surrender of the same lands to the use of a purchaser thereof (k), he shall make such inrolment; and every such conveyance, when so inrolled, shall have the like effect, in respect of such copyhold or customary lands, as if the same had been of freehold tenure; nevertheless, until such lands shall have been enfranchised, by virtue of the powers hereinafter contained, they shall continue subject to the same fines (l), (f) In the absence of an agreement to the contrary, the costs of making out the title are paid by the company. See post, 348; and see the evidence given before the Lords' Committee, ante, 262.

(g) It seems to be the practice of railway companies to be satisfied with a good holding title. See the evidence given before the Lords' Committee, ante, 262. Where a company purchased lands from a municipal corporation and made their railway over it, and a dispute afterwards arose as to the title to the lands, but the corporation obtained a verdict on an ejectment, as it was alleged, by surprise, and the company, under the pressure of the judgment, and to retain possession of the land, paid the purchase-money to the corporation, Sir J. Romilly, M. R., upon a representation that the title to the land was really in dispute, and being of opinion that, as the vendors were trustees, the money ought originally to have been paid into Court, under the 69th section of the Lands Clauses Act, ordered the corporation to bring the money into Court, whilst the rights of the parties were under discussion.

rents, heriots and services as were theretofore payable and of right accustomed. And by sect. 96 the company are required, within a certain period afterwards, to pay the lord of the manor compensation, to be assessed according to the mode prescribed, for the enfranchisement of the land (m). The lands, when enfranchised, are to be held in free and common socage; and if the lord fails to enfranchise the lands, the company may execute a deed-poll, in the manner provided in the case of a purchase of lands (n): (Sect. 97.) Rents payable in respect of copyhold lands may, in certain cases, be apportioned in the manner prescribed: (Sect. 98.)

As to common and waste lands, it is provided, that compensation in respect of the right in the soil shall be paid by the company to the lord of the manor: (Sect. 99.) And, upon payment or deposit thereof in the Bank, a conveyance from the lord of the manor to the company will operate as if he had been seised in fee simple; and in default of such conveyance the company may execute a deed-poll, in the manner provided in the case of a purchase of lands: (Sect. 100.) The compensation to be paid to the commoners is determined by agreement, made between the company and a committee of commoners: (Sect. 101.) The members of such committee are not to exceed five in number, chosen by the commoners at a meeting, convened by the company, by public advertisement and notice: (Sects. 102, 103.) The committee may then agree with the company, as to compensation for the extinction of the commonable rights; and the committee receive the amount, and apportion it among the commoners (o): (Sect. 104.) If the committee and the company cannot agree, the compensation is determined as in other cases of disputed compensation (Sect. 105); or, if no committee be appointed, then by a surveyor, to be appointed by two justices: (Sect. 106.) Upon payment or deposit of the money agreed upon or determined for compensation, the company may execute a deed-poll, in the manner provided in the case of a purchase of lands, and thereupon the lands vest in the company, discharged from all commonable and other rights: (Sect. 107.)

If the mortgagee fails to convey the lands, or to adduce a good title, the company may deposit the monies in the Bank, and execute a deed-poll in the manner provided in the case of a purchase of lands, and all the interest of the mortgagee thereupon vests in the company: (Sect. 109.) If the mortgaged lands are of less value than the mortgage debt, a provision is made for ascertaining the amount of compensation: (Sect. 110.) A provision is also made for completing the title of the company, without affecting the remedies possessed by the mortgagee, under the mortgage-deed, against the mortgagor: (Sect. 111.) In like manner, provision is made for ascertaining the compensation, and completing the title of the company, where a part only of the mortgaged lands is taken, and the mortgagee does not consider the remaining part sufficient security (q): (Sects. 112, 113.) Where lands are subject to rent-charges, it is provided that differences respecting the consideration to be paid for releasing them from such charges, are to be determined as in other cases of disputed compensation: (Sect. 115.) If only a part of the lands charged be required, then such part may be released, by agreement between the owner of the lands, and the party entitled to the rent-charge on the one part, and the company on the other part: otherwise by two justices: but if the remaining lands are a sufficient security, then, by consent, such remaining lands may be made subject to the whole charge: (Sect. 116.) If the party entitled to the rent-charge fails to release it, or to make a good title, the company may deposit the compensation money in the Bank, and execute a deed-poll in the manner provided in the case of a purchase of lands; and thereupon the rent-charge becomes extinguished: (Sect. 117.) If the lands released were subject to the charge, jointly with other lands, such other lands remain liable for the whole, or the remainder of the charge, as the case may be; and the company may affix their common seal to the instrument which created the charge, stating the facts; and such memorandum is made evidence: (Sect. 118.)

With respect to the form of the conveyance, the statute provides that conveyances of lands to be purchased may be according to the form in the schedules (A. and B.) (t) to the act annexed, or as near thereto as the circumstances of the case will admit, or by deed in any other form which the company may think fit (u); and all conveyances so made are effectual to vest the lands thereby conveyed in the company, and operate to merge all terms of years attendant by express declaration, or by construction of law, on the estate or interest so thereby conveyed, and to bar and to destroy all such estates tail, and all other estates, rights, titles, remainders, reversions, limitations, trusts and interests whatsoever of and in the lands comprised in such conveyances, which shall have been purchased or compensated for, by the consideration therein mentioned; but, although terms of years be thereby merged, they shall in equity afford the same protection, as if they had been kept on foot and assigned to a trustee for the company to attend the reversion and inheritance (x): (Sect. 81.)

The costs of all such conveyances are to be borne by the company, and such costs include all charges and expenses incurred, on the part as well of the seller as of the purchaser, of all conveyances and assurances of any such lands, and of any outstanding terms or interests therein, and of deducing, evidencing and verifying the title to such lands, terms, or interests, and of making out and furnishing such abstracts and attested copies as the company may require, and all other reasonable expenses incident to the investigation, deduction and verification of such title (y): (Sect. 82.)

(t) See these forms, post, App. Some useful observations on the use of these statutory forms may be seen in Messrs. Friend and Ware's Collection of Precedents of Conveyances relating to transfers of Lands to Railway Companies, 133.

(u) This deed must be stamped with the stamp duty which would have been payable upon a conveyance of the land. Railway companies will probably be advised, in all cases which fall under the purview of the 77th section, to perfect their title, by executing a deed-poll in pursuance of the statute. It seems to have been the intention of the Legislature (probably with a view to the Stamp Acts) to require a conveyance in all cases. In the following cases, which arose on Canal Acts, it was decided that lands may be vested otherwise than by an actual conveyance. Bruce v. Willis, 11 A. & E. 463; 2 Railw. C. 7; 3 P. & Dav. 220; Doe v. Warwick Canal Co., 2 Bing. N. C. 483; 2 Scott, 7; Earl of Harborough v. Shardlow, 7 M. & W. 87; 2 Railw. C. 253. But it will be found that 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, differs materially from the Canal Acts above referred to. A railway company, requiring to take lands, gave notice of their intention to the plaintiff, who had an annuity charged upon them, as a person having an interest therein. The plaintiff claimed compensation, but the company, without attending to that claim, purchased the property from a prior incumbrancer, who had a power of sale, and it was decided by Kindersley, V.C., that the plaintiff was entitled to be paid the amount of his charge, according to the value at the time he received the notice, although the company had obtained a conveyance of the legal estate in the lands. *Hill v. If the company and the party entitled to any of the above costs do not agree as to the amount, the costs may be taxed (z) by one of the taxing Masters of the Court of Chancery, or by a Master in Chancery in Ireland, upon an order of the same Court; and the company are required to pay what the Master shall certify to be due, or, in default, the same may be recovered in the same way as any other costs payable under an order of the Court, or the same may be recovered by distress, in the manner provided in the act; and the expense of taxing such costs are to be borne by the company, unless, upon the taxation, one-sixth part of the amount be disallowed, in which case the costs of taxation are to be borne by the party whose costs are taxed: (Sect. 83.)

Costs of conveyance.

In a case decided before the passing of the Consolidation Act, where a landowner contracted with a railway company to sell them a certain portion of his land, and the landowner died, and the legal estate in the lands descended to infants, it was ruled, that, as the vendor had suffered the legal estate in the lands to descend to the infants, and had thereby occasioned the necessity of a suit, in order to procure a conveyance of the legal estate, the costs of the suit ought to be defrayed out of the purchase-money (a).

When the company are not liable to the costs of making the title.

So, where the trustee of a copyhold estate died, leaving an infant his heir, and the cestui que trust agreed to sell a part of the estate to a company for the purposes of a railway act, and, to complete the title, it became necessary to take proceedings under the Trustee Act, 1 Will. IV. c. 60, to get a surrender from a person appointed in the place of the infant, and the taxing Master having allowed all the costs of the proceedings, as against the company, Sir J. Romilly, M. R., decided, that these costs ought not to have been allowed, saying:—

Costs of title.
Re South Wales Co.

“These costs do not come within the 82nd section. It is important to observe the difference between the 80th and 82nd clauses. The 80th provides, that railway companies shall pay, not only the costs and reasonable charges and expenses ‘of the purchase or taking of the lands,’ but also all those ‘which shall have been incurred in consequence thereof.’ But the 82nd clause, which is applicable to the present case, specifies that the costs to be paid by the company shall be these [His Honor read the section]. I cannot think the costs in question costs of any ‘conveyance or assurance,’ or of ‘deducing, evidencing or verifying the title,’ or incident to the ‘investigation, deduction and verification of such title.’”

“It is said, that this was a difficulty as to the conveyance: that is so; but I find nothing in the 82nd clause which makes it incumbent on the company to pay the expenses of getting a proper person appointed to make the conveyance to the company. If that argument were carried to its full extent, it might be necessary to pay the costs of every mortgagee on the land, because the concurrence of a mortgagee is always a question of conveyance, and not of title. Here it was the duty of the vendor selling the property to have a proper tenant to the copyhold, for without one it was exposed to a forfeiture to the lord. Besides this the vendors got a tenant admitted, not only to the land sold to the company, but to the whole estate. I think the company are bound to pay the costs of the conveyance, and of deducing, evidencing and verifying the title, but not of the proceedings instituted for the purpose of constituting a proper person to convey the estate to them" (b).

V. Interests in Lands omitted to be purchased through mistake or inadvertence.

The following provisions are made by the Lands Clauses Act, with respect to interests in lands which have, by mistake or inadvertence, been omitted to be purchased:—

Company empowered to purchase interests in lands the purchase whereof may have been omitted by mistake.

8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, s. 124, App. 68.

By sect. 124, if at any time after the company shall have entered upon any lands which they were authorized to purchase, and which shall be permanently required for the purposes of the special act, any party shall appear to be entitled to any estate, right or interest in or charge affecting such lands, which the company shall, through mistake or inadvertence, have failed or omitted duly to purchase or to pay compensation for, then, whether the period allowed for the purchase of lands shall have expired or not, the company shall remain in the undisturbed possession of such lands, provided, within six months after notice of such estate, right, interest or charge, in case the same shall not be disputed by the company, or, in case the same shall be disputed, then within six months after the right thereto shall have been finally established by law in favour of the party claiming the same, the company shall purchase or pay compensation for the same, and shall also pay to such party, or to any other party who may establish a right thereto, full compensation for the mesne profits, or interest which would have accrued to such parties respectively in respect thereof, during the interval between the entry of the company thereon, and the time of the payment of such purchase-money or compensation by the company, so far as such mesne profits or interest may be recoverable in law or equity; and such purchase-money or compensation shall be agreed on or awarded and paid in like manner as, according to the provisions of this act, the same respectively would have been agreed on or awarded and paid, in case the company had purchased such estate, right, interest or charge before their entering upon such land, or as near thereto as circumstances will admit (c).

By sect. 125, in estimating the compensation to be given for any such last-mentioned lands, or any estate or interest in the same, or for any mesne profits thereof, the jury, or arbitrators, or justices (as the case may be), shall assess the same, according to what they shall find to have been the value of such lands, estate, or interest and profits, at the time such lands were entered upon by the company, and without regard to any improvements or works made in the said lands by the company, and as though the works had not been constructed.

How value of such lands to be estimated.

By sect. 126, in addition to the said purchase-money, compensation or satisfaction, and before the company shall become absolutely entitled to any such estate, interest or charge, or to have the same merged or extinguished for their benefit, they shall, when the right to any such estate, interest or charge shall have been disputed by the company, and determined in favour of the party claiming the same, pay the full costs and expenses (d) of any proceedings, at law or in equity, for the determination or recovery of the same, to the parties with whom any such litigation in respect thereof shall have taken place; and such costs and expenses shall, in case the same shall be disputed, be settled by the proper officer of the Court in which such litigation took place.

Company to pay the costs of litigation as to such lands.
Sect. 126.

It has been held that the effect of sect. 124 is, that if the company dispute the title of the claimant an action of ejectment may be brought, but the Court will stay execution till six months after the title of the claimant is established (e). But if the company do not dispute the title, and asking for delay to consult legal advisers does not amount to disputing the title, an ejectment cannot be brought for six months after notice of the claim (f), that is, after production of the abstract of title (g). This was decided in Jolly v. Wimbledon and Dorking R. Co., in the Exchequer Chamber, when Erle, C. J., in delivering judgement, said:—

If title disputed, ejectment lies.

Otherwise not.

Jolly v. Wimbledon and Dorking R. Co.

"The statute provides for taking the land under every modification of interest, and for the making of compensation in respect of every lawful claim; and it has been uniformly held, that wherever compensation is provided under the statute in respect of any claim, there the common-law remedies in respect of that claim are suspended or taken away. By the sections preceding the 124th, provisions are made in respect of interests known when the lands are taken. The taking is made lawful to the company, the compensation is secured to the owner, and the ordinary remedies at law for the taking alleged to be wrongful are taken away. Then follows sect. 124, with respect to interests in lands which have been already taken, and which interests by mistake have been omitted to be purchased. The intention of the section, by analogy with what has preceded, would be to give the same protection against actions in respect of those interests as had been before given in respect of other interests in land. The words are,—the company shall remain in undisturbed possession, if they duly compensate. These words express that the possession not only is then lawful, but has been and shall continue so if the condition is performed. It is very reasonable that a company, giving all parliamentary publicity with plans and books of reference, should have security from litigation for their works under their statute. It is expressly given in respect of all possible known interests, and it seems unreasonable to suppose that an unknown interest should be alone intended to have the privilege of bringing an action against the company, together with a right to compensation under the statute. If, during the parliamentary inquiry, and the company's treaty with the mortgagor, and the laying down of the railway on the lands, the mortgagee kept his mortgage unknown, the company ought to have time to inquire after notice of the claim, that is, after production of the abstract of title. The claim may be unfounded or fraudulent, or it may involve claims of other parties. The necessity for time and caution is shown by Hyde v. Mayor of Manchester (h), for there the company had paid for the land in question to one proprietor, and had to pay for it again to Mr. Hyde, with all mesne profits and costs, as between attorney and client, because the arbitrator had made a mistake in the boundary between two properties. Here the question of the validity of the deed, of its operation on five-sixths of the land, of deducting what is due to the mortgagee from the compensation to be paid to the mortgagor, and of deducting for the right of the lessee, if any should exist, must be considered before the compensation can be settled. If the possession of the company is lawful for six months after the title is produced, or the dispute determined, all rights and liabilities would be secured in good order, and this defence would prevail. On the other hand, if ejectment lies for every claimant of an unknown interest before he shows the ground of his claim and allows time for considering it, confusion and disorder will be introduced; for the company will have to decide whether they will suffer judgment by default and hazard the stay of execution upon a conflict of affidavits, or defend the cause with all the risks and imputations brought upon the present defendants for so doing; and also, if within six months compensation is made, any judgment that should have been obtained would thereby become futile. And then no provision is made in respect of costs, either to the claimant as between party and party, or as between attorney and client, or to the company in respect of useless litigation, which the claimant chooses to force them to, and all for no other purpose than securing some promptness in making compensation, about which litigation has probably increased, if not created, the delay. In the case of the Marquis of Salisbury v. Great Northern R. Co. (i), the title was shown and disputed, and ejectment was brought to try the title, and it was doubted whether it would lie for lands of which the possession was to be undisturbed; and it was held to be by implication given in the case where the title should be disputed, solely for the purpose of trying the title, execution being stayed as soon as that purpose should be effected. If the title is disputed, the section may be held to give by implication a right to resort to law, and, by limiting the right to the case of disputed title, all would be in order. But if it is given where there is no dispute of title, the confusion above described would follow. This judgment does not conflict with any opinion of the Court below, who considered that the point here was within Lord Salisbury's case, but, as above mentioned, that case appears to us to have no application to the present, because there the title was disputed, here it is not."

(i) Ante, 351.

In the following case the Court of Chancery refused an injunction to stay proceedings to assess compensation under sect. 124. The defendants, the owners of waterworks, solicited a bill in Parliament to extend their works, by constructing a reservoir upon the lands of the plaintiff and others. The plaintiff petitioned against the bill; but, upon an agreement, that the value of the land and the compensation should be settled by arbitration, and that the defendants should fix the exact quantity of the plaintiff's land required within six months after the bill should have passed, he withdrew his opposition, and the bill became an act. The act incorporated a former special act and the Lands Clauses Act, and empowered the defendants to take certain parts of the plaintiff's lands, according to the deposited plans. Prior to the expiration of the six months after the act had passed, the defendants gave the plaintiff notice, specifying the portions of his land that would be required, according to the boundaries in the plan and book of reference. The arbitration proceeded, and, after the expiration of six months, the plaintiff pointing out on the arbitration the inaccuracy in the boundaries, which attributed to the plaintiff's land less in admeasurement than he possessed, the arbitrator made his award, giving compensation for land described according to the plan and book of reference only; but it was in dispute whether he had included in his assessment of value the two roods and five perches which the plaintiff claimed beyond the admeasurement of the land comprised in the plan and book of reference. The defendants paid the amount awarded to the plaintiff. The defendants had made a statutory conveyance to themselves, by deed-poll, describing the land according to the inaccurate plan and book of reference, and they took possession of the land. The plaintiff recovered the two roods and five perches, in an action of ejectment against the defendants (k). The defendants then proceeded (within six months after a motion for a new trial made by them had been refused), under the 124th section, to issue their warrant to the sheriff to summon a jury to ascertain the value of the land, and obtain the compulsory purchase of it from the plaintiff. The plaintiff filed a bill for an injunction restraining such proceedings, but Sir J. Parker, V.C., refused it, saying:—

“The defendants must show, in order to bring themselves within the 124th section, that it was through mistake or inadvertence that they had failed or omitted duly to purchase or pay compensation for that land. It appears to me perfectly clear, not only that it was through mistake or inadvertence, but that it was through mistake or inadvertence into which they had been led by the imperfect information of the plaintiff himself, and the way in which he communicated it to them. It appears to me, therefore, that they are clearly within the position of being parties who have failed to purchase the land within proper time, through mistake or inadvertence. Then the plaintiff's counsel said, that might well be so, if the defendants were not bound by the special agreement; but that, by the agreement which they had entered into with the plaintiff to withdraw his opposition to the act, they were bound, within a certain time, to state what precise lands they wanted; that they were therefore not acting under the Lands Clauses Act, but were actually dealing with him on the footing of this agreement, and are now trying to set up something against the agreement. But I do not think that is the true construction of the 124th clause, because the 124th clause provides for all cases in which the promoters of the undertaking shall have entered upon any land which they were authorized to purchase, if it appears that through mistake or inadvertence they failed or omitted duly to pay for it. It seems to me I have nothing to do with the mode in which they entered, or the contract under which they entered into possession of these lands; it is quite enough that the lands which they are in possession of are lands which they were authorized to purchase, and that they have not acquired a complete title to them, not from any fault of their own, but solely on account of mistake or inadvertence. It appears to me quite immaterial how, whether by the agreement or by the compulsory powers, or in what other way, they had got into possession of the land, if the circumstances are, that they are in that position, and that, through mistake or inadvertence they failed to get a complete title. I therefore think they are within the 124th clause; and it seems to me they are within the time provided by the clause, because the clause gives them six months, after the right shall have been finally established at law. They are within six months from the time when the motion for a new trial was refused; and up to that time I think they were justified in saying, that, if they had not got a legal title, they had got at all events an equitable title. I am not satisfied, that at this moment they have not got an equitable title, which they might have enforced, as plaintiffs, against the former owner, and have compelled him to withdraw these proceedings, or to stay his proceedings in the action of ejectment. Therefore it appears to me, as far as can be determined upon an interlocutory motion, that the defendants are proceeding regularly and properly, under the 124th section; and that the plaintiff has no right to come here and interfere with them; and I must refuse the motion with costs" (h).

I. The Line of Railway, and herein of Deviations.

WE have seen that the parliamentary plans and books of reference, which are referred to in every special act, point out the course of the railway (a), and, with the exceptions presently to be noticed, no deviations from the line thus laid down are permitted (b). But a power to rectify mistakes is reserved to the company, by the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act. Thus, by sect. 7, if any omis-

(b) For this reason, it frequently becomes necessary to obtain a supplementary act of Parliament, to authorize deviations in the line of the railway. A company were empowered to take lands, and to deviate one hundred yards from the line laid down, provided such deviation was made within two years from the passing of their act, and which two years would expire in July, 1838. It appeared that, in January, 1837, a deviation in the line, within the prescribed limit, was made. By an act, passed in May, 1837, the time by the first act limited for the compulsory purchase of lands was enlarged for one year, but provided that no deviation from the line laid down should be made after the expiration of the period by the first act limited. The railway company having, subsequently to July, 1838, given notice to owners of land on the line to which they had deviated in January, 1837, of their intention to take the lands—on a motion for an injunction, Lord Cottenham, C., decided that the second act gave the company an enlarged period of one year, in which to exercise the power of taking the land in the line to which they had so deviated. *Dun Navigation Company v. sion, mis-statement or erroneous description has been made of lands or owners, &c., in the parliamentary plans, schedules or books of reference, the company, after giving notice, may apply to two justices, who have power to certify that the omission arose from mistake, and thereupon to correct the same (d). The certificate must be deposited with the clerks of the peace, parish clerks and postmasters, with whom the plans are deposited; and after such certificate has been given, the company may make the works in accordance with it. And by sect. 8, the company are required to deposit with the clerks of the peace, parish clerks and postmasters, a plan and section of all alterations from the original plans and sections which have been approved by Parliament. These plans may be inspected and copied by persons interested, in the same manner as the original plans and sections under 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 83 (e): (Sect. 9.) Copies of these plans and books of reference, certified by the clerk of the peace, are receivable in evidence: (Sect. 10.)

“And whereas plans and sections of the railway, showing the line and levels thereof, and also books of reference, containing the names of the owners and lessees and occupiers of the land through which the same is intended to pass, have been deposited with, &c.: be it enacted, that, subject to the provisions in this and the said recited acts contained, it shall be lawful for the said company to make and maintain the said railway and works, in the line and upon the lands delineated on the said plans, and described in the said books of reference, and to enter upon, take and use such of the said lands as shall be necessary for such purpose.”

This provision makes it important to ascertain to what extent the plans and sections and books of reference thus referred to are so incorporated with the special acts as to make them obligatory upon the company, when they proceed to construct the railway and other works.

It has been decided by the House of Lords, and may be considered to be settled beyond dispute, that the plans deposited under the Standing Orders, prior to the introduction of a bill into Parliament, are not binding upon the company nor to be regarded, except so far as the representations they contain are afterwards incorporated in and made part of the act of Parliament (f). This being the law, the question in each case as to the obligatory character of plans and sections is either wholly or in part dependent on the construction of the act authorizing the execution of the works.

(d) Taylor v. Clemson, 2 Q. B. 978; 3 Railw. C. 65; 11 Cl. & Fin. 610. It would seem that if the justices are satisfied that the omission, &c. arose from mistake, they are bound to certify. In Ex parte Central Wales R. Co., Q. B., Mich. T. 1864, the Court of Queen's Bench granted a rule nisi for a mandamus to justices to certify under sect. 7, which rule was afterwards made absolute by consent on certain terms.

(f) This rule renders it incumbent on landowners not to rely upon the statements in the deposited plans, as to the surface levels.

The above rule was laid down in the case of North British R. Co. v. Tod (g), the facts of which case were as follows:—The deposited plans showed that a railway would intersect an avenue leading to a mansion-house, in a cutting of fifteen feet four inches, and that the level of the roadway of the avenue, at that place, would be raised two feet by a bridge, under which the railway would be carried. The owner of the mansion-house was averse to the railway being carried through his avenue at all, but, relying upon the representations contained in the plan and sections, was induced to abstain from opposing the bill in Parliament. The company, after the act was obtained, proposed to intersect the avenue, by a cutting of only two feet ten inches; and the bridge would in consequence rise seventeen and a-half feet above the level of the avenue, thereby causing a deep descent on both sides. This proposed line was clearly within the limits of deviation permitted by the acts of Parliament, both vertically and laterally, but the descriptions in the deposited plans and sections, which showed the cutting of fifteen feet four inches, were founded upon a mistake made by the engineer who prepared them. Under these circumstances, the Court of Session in Scotland prohibited the company from crossing the avenue in the manner proposed; but their decision was reversed by the House of Lords, who laid down the rule above mentioned, and held that in the case then before the House, the special and general railway acts made the plan only binding to the extent of determining the datum line, and the line of railway measured with reference to that datum line, but not with reference to the surface levels of the lands; and that it made no difference that the deposited plans were so incorrect as altogether to mislead the owner of the lands, with reference to the manner in which his property would be affected by the railway works.

In giving judgment, Lord Lyndhurst, C., said:—

“The first question is, what is the rule in respect to applications for interdicts in Scotland, or for injunctions in England, as applicable to cases of this kind? The case on the part of the respondent being, that a plan was exhibited to him and to the public, previous to the passing of the act under which the railway was intended to be made, which plan represented that the railway would pass over his land, in a cutting of something more than fifteen feet from the surface. The respondent alleges that, giving faith to these representations, he had, as he naturally might, come to the conclusion as to what course he was to pursue with reference to the supposed state of circumstances as represented upon that plan; and that now the company have not only deviated, which they had a right to do, by another line within the prescribed distance, which is one hundred yards, but they also propose to deviate beyond five feet vertically, which is the limit of the vertical deviation imposed by the act; that is, they propose to come nearer the surface by a space exceeding five feet. The company say that they do not dispute that they are actually coming nearer the surface, to a much greater extent than the five feet, but they say, that they are still within the prescribed deviation from the datum line, as laid down for the formation of the railway; the datum line being an imaginary line, taking its commencement from some given point at a certain elevation, and then that line is supposed to run in a perfectly horizontal direction, and the inclination of the railway is measured with reference to that datum line. They say they are within the distance, that is, within the five feet of the line laid down upon those plans, measured with reference to the datum line; and they contend, therefore, that they are within the provisions of the act of Parliament, and that they are not deviating beyond what that act authorizes. Now, as to the effect of plans exhibited previous to the contract being made, or previous to the act of Parliament being obtained, it does seem, from cases which have occurred both in Scotland and in this country, that the rule of the Courts in this country and in the other is no longer a matter of any doubt or dispute. If a contract, or an act of Parliament, refer to a plan, to the extent that the act refers to the plan, and for the purpose for which the act or contract refers to the plan, undoubtedly it is part of the contract or part of the act. As to that there is no dispute. A contract or an act of Parliament either does not refer to a plan at all, or it refers to it for particular purposes. It has been contended, both in Scotland and in England, that the defendant in the suit, or those who claim the benefit of the provisions of an act of Parliament, previous to this enactment being made, or the contract being concluded, have represented that the works are to be carried on in a particular mode, upon a plan shown previous to the powers being obtained under the act, or the contract being concluded, and that the party obtaining the act, or obtaining the contract, is bound by such representation. There was a case very much considered in Scotland, The Feoffees of Heriot's Hospital v. Gibson (h), and several cases have occurred in the Courts of equity in this country. It was my fortune to have to consider the matter very minutely in Squire v. Campbell (i), in which I thought it my duty to review all the cases that had occurred in the one country and in the other, for the purpose, if possible, of establishing a rule which might be a guide on future occasions where similar cases should occur; and I found that, certainly, what had been very much the opinion of the profession in this country, viz., that the parties were bound by the exhibition of such plans, had met with a very wholesome correction by the doctrine laid down by Lord Eldon and Lord Redesdale, in the case of Heriot's Hospital, decided by this House. Under the authority of that case, in which the point was very distinctly raised, and deliberately decided upon, I came to the conclusion that there was no ground for equitable interposition. Now, my Lords, not relying upon the authority of Squire v. Campbell, but relying, as we are bound to do, upon the case of the Feoffees of Heriot's Hospital, I consider that to be the rule to which the Courts of this country, and the Courts of Session in Scotland, and this House, must hereafter adhere. Taking that, then, to be the rule in examining the facts of this case, and the act of Parliament upon which the question turns, we are not to look at what was represented upon the plan, except so far as its representation is incorporated in, and made part of, the act of Parliament; and the real question, therefore, turns upon this, whether the acts of Parliament do or do not make the datum line, and line of railway with reference to that datum line, the subject-matter of these enactments, and the rule by which the rights of the parties are to be regulated, or whether it also includes the surfaces which, in this instance, accidentally, no doubt, had been very much misrepresented upon the plan. We are first of all, then, to refer to the act of Parliament under which this railway is to be carried into effect, and the enactment is in the 16th section. I may here observe, before I refer to that section, that everything which is out of the act, is to be found in the Standing Orders of the one House or the other; but the plans, which are required to be exhibited by those Standing Orders, except so far as they are made part of this act, are, as I apprehend, entirely out of the question; for although it may be very convenient that Standing Orders should require plans to be exhibited, containing matters which are not binding between the parties, still, when we are looking to what the rights of the parties are, we can only look to the act of Parliament by which those rights are regulated. Plans or proceedings previous to the enactment can have no effect upon the enactments themselves. [His lordship then read the 16th section of the special act, which is similar to the usual clause set out ante, 356.] There is a parliamentary authority that the parties are to be at liberty to make 'the railway and works on the line, and upon the lands delineated in the said plans.' We have therefore only to look at what is the meaning of the word 'line' as used in this act of Parliament. The reciting part of that section speaks of 'lines' and 'levels.' It is therefore necessary to look to other acts, the general acts being required to be incorporated, to see what is the meaning of those terms used in this section; because this is a power under which the company are to act, and if they bring themselves within the meaning of the enactment, explained by provisions and sections to be found in other acts of Parliament, beyond all doubt they are then exercising the powers which the legislature intended to vest in them. In the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act for Scotland (7 & 8 Vict. c. 33), we have several sections to which it is necessary to refer; to the 7th and 8th I only refer for the purpose of observing, that the plans which are therein referred to, are in cases where, after the original plans have been deposited, it has been found that they contain certain errors, and then it defines the means by which the parties are to correct those errors and to make their plans correct. But by the 11th section, 'In making the railway it shall not be lawful for the company to deviate from the levels of the railway, as referred to the common datum line, described in the section approved of by Parliament and as marked on the same, to any extent exceeding, in any place, five feet, without the previous consent of the owners,' &c. It then provides for the case of passing through a town, as to which other provisions are introduced. The description, therefore, of the levels, when it speaks of the levels of a railway, is in very distinct terms. It describes the level of the railway as referring to the common datum line described in the section approved of by Parliament.

"The 15th section provides for a lateral deviation, which is not now in question. The power which is given by that section has been acted upon, and it is not contended that the lateral deviation does exceed that power. Then come the enactments of the 16th section, 'That subject to the provisions in this and the said recited acts contained, it shall be lawful for the company to make and maintain the railway and works in the line, and upon the lands delineated in the said plans.' And then it goes on to enumerate the works which the company are to be authorized to make. Now, taking these enactments, because I do not find that the other acts contain any provisions which are very material to be attended to,—taking those two enactments together, it appears to me to be quite plain, that the legislature intended, in speaking of lines, and in speaking of levels of the intended railway, to confine those provisions and to refer them to the datum line, and not to any other representation. Although great convenience may arise from the plans and sections required by the Standing Orders to be exhibited, previous to the application to Parliament for powers to make the railway, representing the surface as well as the datum line, and the intended line with reference to that datum line, yet if any difficulty should arise as to the construction to be put upon the section to which I have referred, we must recollect that Parliament must be supposed to have had before it, not only the line, as explained in these sections, but also the other surface line which is exhibited in the plan. But the enactment totally disregards the surface line, and confines it in terms to the datum line,—to the line of railway to be measured and ascertained with reference to its distance from the datum line.

“ I say then, that a case does arise upon these provisions of the act, in which the plan indeed is referred to, but is, in the terms of the act of Parliament, referred to only for the purpose of ascertaining the line of the railway, with reference to the datum line. It is not referred to with reference to any surface level. The plan, therefore, is entirely out of the enactment, and it is not to be looked at for the purpose of construing the enactment as to any part of it, except so far as it is referred to and incorporated in the act. Arriving at that construction of the rule upon the provisions of the two acts to which I have referred, and applying it to the principle which has been established in the cases I have mentioned, we have no difficulty in coming to the conclusion, that the application of that principle will necessarily lead to the construction of the clauses to which I have referred. The plan is binding, to the extent of determining the datum line, and the line of railway measured with reference to that datum line, but not with reference to the surface levels of the land, because the act does not apply it for that purpose, but cautiously confines the enactment to the other plans to which I have referred.

“ Acting, therefore, upon the principle so established, and with reference to the construction, or what I conceive to be the construction, to be put upon these sections, although we cannot but greatly lament the hardship which, in all probability, these circumstances have imposed upon the respondent, in having his land interfered with in a manner which he did not at all anticipate ; yet, when we are called upon to consider whether the Court of Session is correct or not, we are bound to look to see what are the powers which these acts vest in the company ; and for the reason I have explained, I come to the conclusion that the company have not exceeded those powers, and do not propose to exceed those powers, in the plans they have formed, and that the Court of Session has been in error in granting the interdict.”

Lord Campbell said :—

“ I acknowledge that I come to the conclusion at which I have arrived with very great reluctance. It seems to me to be a case of very great hardship upon the respondent. But when we come to consider what the law upon the subject is, I feel bound to concur in the opinion which has been expressed. What is the legal construction of the act of Parliament ? Does the company, or does it not, propose to exceed the powers which the acts of Parliament confer upon it ? Now it is admitted, that if the deviation is to be calculated from the datum line alone, they (the company) do not propose, either vertically or laterally, to exceed the powers of deviation which are conferred upon them. Well, then, that raises the question, whether those powers of deviation are to be calculated from the datum line alone, or whether the surface level is to be taken into consideration ; and my opinion is, that the act does refer everything to the datum line. I think it is evident that the 11th section clearly makes the datum line alone that which is to be regarded. The word ‘levels,’ in the plural number, really does not at all include the surface levels. It means merely the levels of the datum line, which point out the course the railway is to go. If that be so, the company do not propose to do anything that they are not authorized to do, according to the letter of the act of Parliament.

“ There certainly was a representation made here on the part of the company, when they proposed to bring in the act, by which they intimated that, at that time, the intention was that the railway should be fifteen feet four inches below the surface of the respondent's property at the point of intersection; and that the bridge, by which his approach should pass over the railway, would not be more than three feet. But this was entirely an intimation, on the part of the company, that such was their intention. An act of Parliament of this sort has, by Lord Eldon and by all other judges who have considered the subject, been considered as a contract. Well then, what took place was a negociation, it was not a contract. We must disregard it, and we must look to see what the contract was. The contract is to be gathered from the words of the act of Parliament; and that brings us to the question that I first considered, what is the construction of the act of Parliament? That act of Parliament must be considered as overruling and doing away with everything that had taken place prior to the time when the act passed, and renders the representation or proposal of the company, pending the act, of no avail. Many cases have occurred in the courts of common law in which it has been held that everything that takes place before a written contract is signed, is entirely to be disregarded in construing the contract. Now, if the respondent had been cautious, he would have done what I would strongly recommend to all gentlemen hereafter to do, under similar circumstances, which is, to have a special clause introduced into the act of Parliament to protect their rights. I do not believe there is any committee, either in the House of Commons or in the House of Lords, who, if he had asked for a clause, providing that the railroad should be of the depth of fifteen feet four inches (with a power of vertical deviation, perhaps), in crossing his approach, and that he should be able to pass it by a bridge, not more than three feet in height, would not have acceded to such a clause as a matter of course; for it is only reasonable that the respondent's property should be protected in this manner, and that he should be saved from such deformity being erected in the sight of his dwelling-house, which would, for all time to come, be a great nuisance thereto, and might diminish its value. But he abstained from introducing any such clause, and therefore he must be considered as having acceded to the company's having all the powers which the act of Parliament confers upon them. I have read the case of the Feoffees of Heriot's Hospital, and also the admirable judgment of the lower court in Squire v. Campbell, in which all the cases on the subject are reviewed; and these cases remove all doubt from my mind, and induce me now, I may say, without hesitation, although with very great reluctance, to come to the conclusion that, neither upon the construction of the act of Parliament, nor upon the ground of the representation that was made, is there any sufficient reason for supporting this interdict. I therefore agree in the judgment which has been expressed."

The Line of Railway, and Deviations.

North British R. Co. v. Tod.

Lord Campbell's judgment.

This decision of the House of Lords has frequently been acted upon in subsequent cases. The following is an instance (j):—The plaintiff was lessee of certain premises in Hill Street and Navigation Street, Birmingham. The defendants obtained an act for carrying their railway through both these streets, which cross each other at right angles. In the construction of their works it became necessary to erect two bridges, for connecting the portions of the streets intersected by the railway. Both streets were included in the plans and books of reference, but when the plans were deposited it was not contemplated, and it did not appear upon them, that any change in

Lord Campbell, C.J., said:—

"It is quite clear on general principles, and on the authority of North British R. Co. v. Tod (n), that the mere exhibition of plans and sections in Parliament does not make them obligatory upon the company when they obtain an act; it can only be something in the special act itself, or the general act, which can have that effect. It was supposed that by the general act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 14, this obligation must be imposed, considering this road as an 'engineering work;' but it is quite clear that section applies only to the construction of the railway, and not to cross-roads. Then it has been allowed, that in the first special act there is nothing to make these plans and sections obligatory. But reliance is placed on the 9th section of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. ccxlix, which provides, that 'it shall be lawful to the company to construct the bridge for carrying the railway hereby authorized over any roads, or for carrying any roads over the said railway, of the heights and spans and in the manner shown on the section deposited as hereinbefore mentioned.' The inclination of my opinion is, that this section is obligatory so far as it goes; but the question is, to what extent does it go? And we think that it only applies to the heights and spans delineated in the plans and sections, which are expressed, and expressio unius est exclusio alterius. There is nothing said as to the rates of inclination, and it would be strange if they had been in the same way rendered obligatory, because there is a power of deviation from the datum line of railway, which would render them wholly inapplicable. Therefore we think sect. 9 of the supplemental act applies only to the heights and spans delineated in the plans and sections deposited and they have been followed, although the rates of inclination have been altered. There must, therefore, be judgment for the defendants."

The Line of Railway, and Deviations.

R. v. Caledonian R. Co.

With respect to lateral deviations (o), it is enacted, by the Railways Clauses Act, sect. 15, that it shall be lawful for the company to deviate (p) from the line delineated on the plans deposited, provided that no such deviation shall extend to a greater distance than the limits of deviation delineated upon the said plans, nor to a greater extent, in passing through a town, village or lands continuously built upon, than ten yards, or elsewhere to a greater extent than one hundred yards from the said line; and that the railway, by means of such deviations, be not made to extend into the lands of any person, whether owner, lessee or occupier, whose name is not mentioned in the books of reference, without the previous consent in writing of such person, unless the name of such person shall have been omitted by mistake, and the fact that such omission proceeded from mistake shall have been certified in manner therein, or in the special act, provided for in cases of unintentional errors in the said books of reference.

with their slopes and embankments in other lands, provided they have the consent of the parties to whom those lands belong, and not without" (r). The Line of Railway, and Deviations.

This decision was afterwards followed in the Queen's Bench, in a case (s) where the Court said the expression "deviation" in the acts of Parliament, and particularly the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 15, is to be taken with reference to the line of railway only; that is, that the line of railway actually laid down shall not deviate more than 100 yards from the line laid down and delineated in the parliamentary plans, the medium filum vice of each being the commencement and termination in measuring those 100 yards (t).

But it is important to notice that this power of deviation could not formerly be exercised at all upon lands on which viaducts or tunnels were intended to be made. For by sect. 13 it is enacted that where a viaduct is marked on the plan as intended to be made, it must be made accordingly (u); and where a tunnel is marked on the plan as intended to be made at any place, the same is required to be made accordingly, unless the owners of the land shall consent that the same shall not be so made. A tunnel might therefore be dispensed with by consent, but a viaduct could not. And by sect. 14 (x), tunnels, among other engineering works, might not be deviated from, though in certain cases cuttings might be substituted for tunnels and embankments for viaducts, by permission of the Board of Trade; and the Court of Common Pleas decided (y), that the effect of these provisions, if unaffected by the special act, was, that where on the plan deposited in Parliament and referred to in the act, a tunnel is shown, there at that very place the tunnel must be made, unless dispensed with by consent, and that the power of deviation given by sect. 15, in ordinary cases, does not arise. Viaducts and tunnels.

(r) A railway act prescribed the general line of the railway, and afterwards (sect. 59) directed that it should pass between streets A. and C., and so as to leave twenty-four yards between the railway and either A. or C., or otherwise, if there were not twenty-four yards between, the company should, if required, purchase such space as was less than twenty-four yards, and also half of A. or C., as the case might be. The railway, without deviating from the line first prescribed, passed over street A.; but the company had previously purchased the whole of street A. It was decided that this was a compliance with sect. 59. Taylor v. Clemson, 2 Q. B. 978; 3 Railw. C. 65; 11 Cl. & F. 610.

But see now 26 & 27 Vict. c. 92, s. 4, post, p. 366.

Power to alter engineering works,

if authorized by certificate of Board of Trade.

But the difficulties caused by these provisions were removed by the Railways Clauses Act, 1863, which provided (sect. 4), that—

“Notwithstanding anything in the Railways Clauses Consolidation Acts respectively contained, the company, in the construction of the railway may deviate from the line or level of any arch, tunnel or viaduct, described on the deposited plans or sections, so as the deviation be made within the limits of deviation shown on those plans, and subject to the limitations contained in sects. 11, 12 and 15 of those acts respectively, and so as the nature of the work described be not altered; and may also substitute any engineering work not shown on the deposited plans or sections for an arch, tunnel or viaduct, as shown thereon; provided that every such substitution be authorized by a certificate of the Board of Trade; and the Board of Trade may grant such certificate in case it appears to them, on due inquiry, that the company has acted in the matter with good faith, and that the owners, lessees and occupiers of the lands in which the substitution is intended to be made consent thereto, and also that the safety and convenience of the public will not be diminished thereby: Provided that nothing in the present section shall affect any power given to the company, or to the Board of Trade, by sects. 11, 12, 14 or 15 of the last-mentioned acts respectively.”

Branch line.

It has also been ruled, that lands within the limits of deviation may be taken for the purpose of forming a branch railway, although the main line has been previously completed, inasmuch as 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 16, contains a power authorizing the making of “permanent ways,” and the effect of this provision is not affected by sect. 45, which applies to such lands for additional conveniences, as the owner may be willing to sell (z).

When lands beyond limits of deviation may be taken.

A question has also arisen as to the right of the company to take lands beyond the limits of the lines of deviation, as laid down in the plans, in cases where the lands sought to be obtained have been numbered and described in the books of reference, although they were not within the lines of deviation. The decisions (a) show that in certain cases the company may use such lands, if they are necessary for the purpose of forming stations, or other works of a similar character described in sect. 16 (post, 369). It may, however, be doubtful whether these decisions can be applied to the extent of authorizing a company to take lands beyond the limits of deviation, unless it appears that the object is to carry into effect the declared purposes of the special act (b).

So in Doe d. Armistead v. North Staffordshire R. Co., 20 L. J. (Q. B.) 249; 16 Q. B. 526, a small portion of land beyond the limits of deviation was held to be properly taken by the company; but in that case there had been a notice given by the owner, which fact is relied upon in the judgment.

(b) It will be seen that, in Cother v. Midland R. Co., ubi supra, the act was passed, and the lands were required, for the purposes of an extension. And in Crauford v. Chester and Holyhead R. Co., ubi supra, for the purposes of an additional station.

If the special act prohibits the company from entering upon or taking lands without the consent of the owner, it is then in the power of one individual to stop the progress of the undertaking, although the special act may specifically point out the intended course of the railway. Thus, where a statute authorized a company to form their railway by a certain line over lands described, and a subsequent section provided that nothing in the act should authorize the company to enter into or take or damage the lands or effects of any corporation or person whomsoever, without his consent in writing, it was decided that it was competent for a rival company to refuse to allow their railway to be crossed, although the effect of such a construction of the statute was to prevent the undertaking from being carried into execution (c).

The Line of Railway, and Deviations.

Where owner's consent required.

It appears also that a railway company cannot sell part of the soil of their line, after it is opened for public traffic, unless by express powers contained in an act of Parliament. Thus, where a railway company were authorized by their act to cross the line of another company and to purchase lands for that purpose, and they accordingly gave a notice to the latter company to treat for certain lands adjoining to the railway, but it was insisted that the company giving the notice to treat were bound to purchase the soil on which the railway was actually constructed at the point of crossing, as well as the lands on each side of that railway; upon an application for a mandamus, it was decided that the acts gave no power to one company to sell, or to the other company to purchase, any part of the soil of the line of the intersected railway (d).

The soil of another railway cannot be purchased, except under express powers.

So where a company had power "to make and maintain the railway and works on the line and upon the lands delineated in the parliamentary plan, and described in the books of reference, and to enter upon, take and use the lands, or such of them as should be necessary for that purpose;" but they were not to enter upon, take or use any of the land or property of a certain pre-existing company, or in any manner to alter, vary or interfere with that railway, or any of the works appertaining thereto, save only for the purpose of effecting the junction, in manner in the act authorized, and not otherwise; and by another clause in the act, certain powers were given to the company for effecting a junction with the pre-existing railway: *Kindersley, V. the purpose of effecting a junction, to purchase the plaintiffs' lands, then it gave powers for that purpose,—but that assumed that the junction could not be effected without purchasing; but his Honor being of opinion that there was no ground for assuming that the junction could not be effected without making a purchase, he decided that the company had a right of easement only over the plaintiffs' line, so as to effect the junction (e).

Where a special act provided that nothing therein contained should be construed to prevent any owner or occupier of any land through which the railway might pass from carrying any railway or other road, which such owner or occupier was authorized to make in his lands, across the main railway, within the respective lands or grounds of such owner or occupier, it was decided in the House of Lords, on appeal, that this provision enabled the owner of land on one side of the railway to make a railway across the main railway and over lands on the other side, of which he had become lessee since the passing of the act, because the clause was obviously intended for the convenience of those who might be occupiers, or from time to time become occupiers, of the land, partly on one side and partly on the other side of the principal railway, and that without reference to the title under which the lands might be held (f).

So where a canal act authorized the proprietors of any mines of coal, within certain parishes, to make any railway or roads to convey their coals to the intended canal, over the lands of any person, first paying satisfaction for damages, &c., it was held that this power to make railways extended to persons who became proprietors of coal-mines subsequently to the passing of the act; and that such proprietors were empowered to make railways to be traversed by locomotive engines, though such engines were not in use when the act passed (g).

And a railway company have been held bound to afford facilities to another railway company to form a junction with their line, although the latter company were not entitled to purchase the land, and their powers of compulsory purchase of land had expired; and an injunction was granted by Parker, V. C., to restrain the defendants from interfering with the plaintiffs in making a junction (h).

"They may make or construct in, upon, across, under or over any lands, or any streets, hills, valleys, roads, railroads or tram-roads, rivers (l), canals, brooks, streams or other waters, within the lands described in the said plans, or mentioned in the said books of reference, or any correction thereof, such temporary or permanent inclined planes, tunnels (m), embankments, aqueducts, bridges, roads (n), ways (o), passages, conduits, drains, piers, arches (p), cuttings and fences, as they think proper (q):

It follows, that if a company carry on their works in such a way as to cause more damage than the necessity of the case requires, a court of equity will restrain them ; for, although the company are not to be prevented from doing anything which is necessary to the due prosecution of their undertaking, they may not, on the other hand, prosecute it in such a manner as to do unnecessary damage to others. Thus, where a railway company were proceeding to erect an arch over a mill-race, for the purpose of sustaining an embankment on which the railway was to be constructed, and it appeared that injury would be done to the mill if the arch were of the proposed dimensions, but that the injury would be avoided, if the arch were of certain larger dimensions, an injunction was granted to restrain the

It is also settled that a railway company is amenable to indictment (c), or information at the instance of the Attorney-General (d), if their works are not made conformably to the powers contained in the statutes.

III. Limitations of Powers in executing certain Engineering Works.

The general powers conferred upon railway companies by the Railways Clauses Act are restrained by provisions requiring that certain engineering works connected with the railway shall be executed in a specified manner.

Limitations of general powers in executing engineering works.

Thus, by sect. 11, in making the railway, it is not lawful for the company to deviate from the levels of the railway as referred to the common datum line (e) described in the section approved of by Parliament, and as marked on the same, to any extent exceeding in any place five feet, or, in passing through a town, village, street or land continuously built upon (f), two feet, without the previous consent in writing of the owners and occupiers of the land in which such deviation is intended to be made (g), or, in case any street or public highway shall be affected by such deviation, then the same shall not be made without the like consent of the trustees or commissioners having the control of such street or public highway, or, if there be no such trustees or commissioners, without the like consent of two or more justices of the peace in petty sessions assembled for that purpose, and acting for the district in which such street or public highway may be situated, or without the like consent of the commissioners for any public sewers, or the proprietors of any canal, navigation, gasworks or waterworks affected by such deviation: provided always, that it shall be lawful for the company to deviate from the said levels to a further extent without such consent as aforesaid, by lowering solid embankments or viaducts, provided that the requisite height of headway, as prescribed by act of Parliament, be left for roads, streets or canals passing under the same: provided also, that notice of every petty sessions to be holden for the purpose of obtaining such consent of two justices as is hereinbefore required shall, fourteen days pre-

*Arches, viaducts,

Sect. 13.

So, with respect to arches, viaducts and tunnels, it is provided, that, where in any place it is intended to carry the railway on an arch or arches or other viaduct, as marked on the said plan or section, the same shall be made accordingly (i); and where a tunnel is marked on the said plan or section, as intended to be made at any place, the same shall be made accordingly (j), unless the owners, lessees and occupiers of the land in which such tunnel is intended to be made shall consent that the same shall not be so made (k).

Gradients and curves.

Sect. 14.

And, as to gradients and curves, tunnels or other engineering works, it is enacted, that it shall not be lawful for the company to deviate from or alter the gradients, curves, tunnels or other engineer-

Subject to the above provisions in regard to altering levels, it shall be lawful for the company to diminish the inclination or gradients of the railway to any extent, and to increase the said inclination or gradients as follows; (that is to say,) in gradients of an inclination not exceeding one in a hundred, to any extent not exceeding ten feet per mile, or to any further extent which shall be certified by the Board of Trade to be consistent with the public safety, and not prejudicial to the public interest; and in gradients of or exceeding the inclination of one in a hundred, to any extent not exceeding three feet per mile, or to any further extent which shall be so certified by the Board of Trade as aforesaid.

It shall be lawful for the company to diminish the radius of any curve described in the said plan, to any extent which shall leave a radius of not less than half a mile, or to any further extent authorized by such certificate as aforesaid from the Board of Trade.

It shall be lawful for the company to make a tunnel, not marked on the said plan or section, instead of a cutting, or a viaduct instead of a solid embankment, if authorized by such certificate as aforesaid from the Board of Trade (m).

And with respect to the crossing of roads, or other interferences therewith, it is enacted, "that if the line of the railway cross any turnpike-road or public highway (n), then (except where otherwise provided by the special act (o)), either such road shall be carried over the railway (p), or the railway shall be carried over such road, by means of a bridge (q), of the height and width, and with the ascent or descent, by this or the special act in that behalf provided; and such bridge, with the immediate approaches, and all other necessary works

(p) This section gives the company an option of carrying the road over the railway, or the railway over the road, as they may think fit, without reference to the level of the line of the railway; and it seems also that the company may, under sect. 16, alter such works, after they have once exercised the option given by the above section. On this ground a writ of mandamus was held to be bad, which commanded a company to carry a road over a highway by means of a bridge, that being the only way in which, according to the level of the line of the railway at the time the writ was applied for, the road could be preserved. *South Eastern R. And every bridge to be erected for the purpose of carrying the railway over any road shall (except where otherwise provided by the special act) be built in conformity with the following regulations; (that is to say,)

The width of the arch shall be such as to leave thereunder a clear space of not less than thirty-five feet if the arch be over a turnpike-road (t), and of twenty-five feet if over a public carriage-road, and of twelve feet if over a private road (u):

The clear height of the arch from the surface of the road shall not be less than sixteen feet for a space of twelve feet if the arch be over a turnpike-road, and fifteen feet for a space of ten feet if over a public carriage-road; and in each of such cases the clear height at the springing of the arch shall not be less than twelve feet:

The clear height of the arch for a space of nine feet shall not be less than fourteen feet over a private carriage-road:

The descent made in the road, in order to carry the same under the bridge, shall not be more than one foot in thirty feet, if the bridge be over a turnpike-road; one foot in twenty feet if over a public carriage-road; and one foot in sixteen feet if over a private carriage-road, not being a tramroad or railroad; or, if the same be a tramroad or railroad, the descent shall not be greater than the prescribed rate of inclination; and if no rate be prescribed, the same shall not be greater than as it existed at the passing of the special act.

s. 50, App. 85.

There shall be a good and sufficient fence on each side of the bridge of not less than four feet, and on each side of the immediate approaches of such bridge of not less than three feet: The road over the bridge shall have a clear space between the fences thereof of thirty-five feet if the road be a turnpike-road, and twenty-five feet if a public carriage-road, and twelve feet if a private road:

The ascent shall not be more than one foot in thirty feet if the road be a turnpike-road (y); one foot in twenty feet if a public carriage-road; and one foot in sixteen feet if a private carriage-road, not being a tramroad or railroad; or, if the same be a tramroad or railroad, the ascent shall not be greater than the prescribed rate of inclination, and if no rate be prescribed, the same shall not be greater than as it existed at the passing of the special act.

But it is provided, that, in all cases where the average available width for the passage of carriages of any existing roads, within fifty yards of the points of crossing the same, is less than the width hereinbefore prescribed for bridges under or over the railway, the width of such bridges need not be greater than such average available width of such roads; but so, nevertheless, that such bridges be not of less width, in the case of a turnpike-road or public carriage-road, than twenty feet: provided also, that, if at any time after the construction of the railway, the average available width of any such road shall be increased beyond the width of such bridge on either side thereof, the company shall be bound, at their own expense, to increase the width (z) of the said bridge to such extent as they may be required by the trustees or surveyors of such road, not exceeding the width of such road as so widened, or the maximum width herein or in the special act prescribed for a bridge in the like case over or under the railway.

may carry any such road over or under the railway, or may construct such altered or substituted road, at an inclination not steeper than the said mesne inclination of the road so to be crossed, or of the road so requiring to be altered, or for which another road shall be substituted (a).

If the company cross, raise, cut through, sink or use (b) any part of any road (c), public or private, so as to render it impassable for, or dangerous, or extraordinarily inconvenient to passengers or other persons, or carriages, they are required, before the commencement of any operations, to cause a sufficient road to be made, instead of the road to be interfered with, and to maintain such road; and, in default of making the substituted road, the company are liable to a heavy penalty, payable to the trustees, &c., if a public road, or, in case of a private road, to the owner (d); and any person sustaining special damage may maintain an action on the case (e): (Sects. 54, 55.) If the road interfered with as above mentioned can be restored compatibly with the formation and use of the railway, the company are required to restore it to as good a condition as the same was in at the time when the same was first interfered with, or as near thereto as may be; and if it cannot be restored, then the company are required to cause the new or substituted road, or some other sufficient substituted road, to be put into a permanently substantial condition, equally convenient as the former road, or as near thereto as circumstances will allow (f); and the former road must be restored, or the substituted road provided, within a certain period, which is prescribed, otherwise a penalty is incurred: (Sects. 56, 57.) If the company use or interfere with (g) any road, they are required from time to time to repair and make good all damage done by them (h); and, in case of difference, two justices may decide the question in the manner prescribed (i): (Sect. 58.)

General Powers.*

We have seen (k) that by sect. 46 the company may, with the consent of two justices, carry the railway across any highway other than a public carriage road on the level. When it is intended to apply to the justices for such consent, fourteen days' public notice of such intended application must be given; and any party aggrieved by the determination of the justices may appeal to the sessions, who may finally determine the question and award costs (Sect. 60); and if the railway shall cross any highway other than a public carriage-way on the level, the company shall, at their own expense, make and at all times maintain (l) convenient ascents and descents, and other convenient approaches, with hand-rails or other fences, and shall, if such highway be a bridleway, erect and at all times maintain good and sufficient gates, and, if the same shall be a footway, good and sufficient gates or stiles, on each side of the railway, where the highway shall communicate therewith: (Sect. 61.) If the company fail to do so, two justices, on application of the surveyor of roads, or two householders, may, after ten days' notice to the company, order them to execute such works under a penalty of 5*l.* a day, and the justices may apply the penalty in executing the works: (Sect. 62.) We shall hereafter see that the Board of Trade have certain powers where the railway crosses roads on a level (m).

The act contains also two sections (47 and 48) (o), providing for cases in which the railway crosses a turnpike road or public carriage road on a level. Section 47 appears to be a substitution for previous statutory provisions (p), than which it is somewhat more extensive. But inasmuch as the crossing of such roads on a level is in general prohibited by sect. 46, it would seem that these provisions only apply to cases in which provision is made by a special act to allow such level crossing. It is therefore thought sufficient to refer generally to them in this place.

Where a railway company pulled down a county bridge and erected another, and agreed with the trustees of a turnpike road to keep the approaches to the bridge in repair, which had been previously repaired by the county, and the road became out of repair, Wightman, J., refused to grant a mandamus calling upon the company to repair the road, as it was not a use of the road within 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 58. The proper course was for the trustees, if they were compelled to repair the road, to avail themselves of their remedy on the agreement. Ex parte Exeter Road Trustees, 16 Jur. 669.

The Railways Clauses Act, 1863, also contains special provisions as to level crossings when authorized by a special act (q).

IV. *Construction of Accommodation Works.*Construction of accommodation works.

8 & 9 Vict. c. 20,
s. 68, App. 88.

The company are required by the Railways Clauses Act to make and at all times maintain (r) the following works (s), for the accommodation of the owners and occupiers of lands adjoining the railway (t): (that is to say,)

Gates, bridges,
&c.

Such and so many convenient gates, bridges, arches, culverts and passages over, under or by the sides of or leading to or from the railway, as shall be necessary for the purpose of making good any interruptions caused by the railway to the use of the lands through which the railway shall be made; and such works shall be made forthwith, after the part of the railway passing over such lands shall have been laid out or formed, or during the formation thereof:

Fences.

Also sufficient posts, rails, hedges, ditches, mounds or other fences, for separating the land taken for the use of the railway from the adjoining lands not taken, and protecting such lands from trespass, or the cattle of the owners or occupiers thereof from straying thereout by reason of the railway (u), together

(q) 26 & 27 Vict. c. 92, s. 5—8, post, Appendix.

(s) What are such accommodation works must be determined at the time of the construction of the line. They are such works as are required by necessity apparent on the surface, and do not apply to such as may be afterwards necessary by prospective working of mines. R. v. Fisher, 32 L. J. (M. C.) 12; 3 Best & S. 191. In Earl of Darnley v. London, Chatham and Dover R. Co., 9 Jur. (N. S.) 148, an agreement had been entered into between the plaintiff and the company that the company should execute certain accommodation works "within one month after they should obtain possession of certain land agreed to be sold to them by the plaintiff." They had possession in December, but, in consequence of negotiations, no notification of the works required was given till March. It was held by Stuart, V. C., that time was of the essence of the contract, but was waived by the conduct of the company and their agents, and he held the company bound to execute the works; but upon appeal the Lords Justices discharged his decree, with liberty to the plaintiff to amend his bill. 33 L. J. (Ch.) 9.

(t) The making of these accommodation works is a matter totally distinct and unconnected with assessing the value of the land. Per Lord Cottenham, C., Skerratt v. North Staffordshire R. Co., 5 Railw. C. 178; and see South Wales R. Co. v. Richards, 18 L. J. (Q. B.) 310; 13 Q. B. 988; ante, 311.

(u) This section is plainly a substitution for 5 & 6 Vict. c. 55, s. 9. (See per Jervis, C. J., as to sect. 10, in Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire R. Co. v. Wallis, 14 C. B. 220; 23 L. J. (C. P.) 85.) The obligation cast upon the company by this section is the same as it would have been at common law, if they had been bound by prescription to repair the fences; in other words, they are only bound to keep up the fences against the cattle of the owners or occupiers of adjoining lands. If therefore cattle stray into a field adjoining the railway, or are there without the owner's consent, and thence get on to the railway and are injured, the comwith all necessary gates (x), made to open towards such adjoining lands, and not towards the railway, and all necessary stiles; and such posts, rails and other fences shall be made forthwith after the taking of any such lands, if the owners thereof shall so require, and the said other works as soon as conveniently may be:

Construction of Accommodation Works.

8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 68, App. 88.

Also all necessary arches, tunnels, culverts, drains or other passages, either over or under, or by the sides of the railway, of such dimensions as will be sufficient at all times to convey the water as clearly from the lands lying near or affected by the railway, as before the making of the railway, or as nearly so as may be; and such works shall be made from time to time as the railway works proceed (y):

Drains.

Also proper watering-places for cattle, where, by reason of the railway, the cattle of any person occupying any lands lying near thereto shall be deprived of access to their former watering-places; and such watering-places shall be so made as to be at all times as sufficiently supplied with water as theretofore, and as if the railway had not been made, or as nearly so as may be; and the company shall make all necessary water-courses and drains for the purpose of conveying water to the said watering places (z):

pany are not liable. Ricketts v. East and West India Docks and R. Co., 12 C. B. 160; 21 L. J. (C. P.) 201; 16 Jur. 1072. So if cattle have strayed on to a highway, or are occupying the highway in a manner not according to the dedication of the owner of the soil, and get thence through an open gate or defective fence on to the railway and are injured, the company are not liable. Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire R. Co. v. Wallis, 14 C. B. 213. But where a colt had strayed on to a highway, and whilst being driven home escaped into a railway yard and thence on to the line and was killed, the company were held liable, as the colt was lawfully using the highway. Midland R. Co. v. Daykin, 17 C. B. 126. The obligation imposed by this section does not apply if the adjoining land belongs to the company; if therefore, e. g., cattle are, by permission of the company, grazing, or on the slopes or embankments of the railway, or in a yard belonging to the company, and stray thence on to the line and get injured, the company would not be liable. Marfell v. South Wales R. Co., 29 L. J. (C. P.) 315. And see Roberts v. Great Western R. Co., 27 L. J. (C. P.) 266; 4 C. B. (N. S.) 506; Hardcastle v. South Yorkshire R. Co., 28 L. J. Co.*, 4 Exch. 580, 6 Railw. C. 239, it was held that an action against the company for injuries sustained through neglect of the duties imposed by this section, must be in case, not trespass. As to the right of distraining damage feasant cattle which have strayed through defect of fences which distrainer was bound to repair, see Singleton v. Williamson, 7 H. & N. 410.

(x) And when a railway crosses a road used for carts or carriages, the company are required to make and maintain gates to fence in the railway at each end of the road, to prevent cattle or horses passing along the road from entering upon the railway while the gates are closed, and also to provide persons to open and shut such gates, which gates the Board of Trade may, if it is more conducive for the public safety, direct to be kept closed across the railway instead of across the ends of the road. 5 & 6 Vict. c. 55, s. 9, App. 11. See Fawcett v. York and North Midland R. Co., 16 Q. B. 610; 20 L. J. (Q. B.) 222.

(y) Repairs of drains by the side of the railway, which, in consequence of sinking of soil caused by mining, are required to protect mines from percolation of water, are not "accommodation works," but the subject of an action. R. v. Fisher, ante, p. 378, note (s). Sections 68 and 69 do not apply to matters occurring beneath the surface. Ibid.

*Construction of Accommodation
Works.*8 & 9 Vict. c. 20,
s. 68, App. 88.

Provided always, that the company shall not be required to make such accommodation works in such a manner as would prevent or obstruct the working or using of the railway, nor to make any accommodation works with respect to which the owners and occupiers of the lands shall have agreed to receive and shall have been paid compensation, instead of the making them.

If any difference arise as to the kind or number of the accommodation works, or as to maintaining them, the same may be determined by two justices (a) (Sect. 69); and if the company fail to obey the justices' order, the party aggrieved may execute the works or repairs himself, and the expenses shall be repaid by the company; and any dispute about the expenses shall be settled by two justices (b); but the railway must not be obstructed or injured for a longer time than is unavoidably necessary for the execution of the accommodation work: (Sect. 70.) If the owners or occupiers of lands consider the accommodation works insufficient for the commodious use of their lands, they may, at their own expense, make such further works as shall be agreed by the company, or, in case of difference, as shall be authorized by two justices: (Sect. 71.) But if the company so desire, all such last-mentioned accommodation works must be constructed under the superintendence of their engineer, subject to certain restrictions: (Sect. 72.) The company cannot be compelled to make further or additional accommodation works after the expiration of a prescribed period: (Sect. 73.) Until the company make bridges or other proper communications between lands intersected by the railway, the persons whose right of way shall be affected may pass and repass with carriages, &c., directly (but not otherwise) across the railway; but if compensation has been received for such communication in lieu thereof, then no right of way may be exercised (c): (Sect. 74.)

(a) It has been held in Ireland that the justices have not jurisdiction to decide whether or not there shall be accommodation works, but only on their kind, number and sufficiency. R. v. Waterford and Limerick R. Co., 2 Ir. Law Rep. (N. S.) 580.

(b) These expenses are therefore not a legitimate subject of compensation, and if a sheriff's jury give anything in respect of them, that will be an excess of jurisdiction, vitiating perhaps the whole of their proceedings. R. v. South Wales R. Co., 13 Q. B. 988.

(c) As to what amounts to a receipt of compensation for the loss of communication between several portions of an estate, see Manning v. Eastern Counties R. Co., 12 M. & W. 237; 3 Railw. C. 637. A railway act enacted, "that it should be lawful for the owners and occupiers of lands through which the railway shall be made (except in cases in which the company shall, at their own expense, have made communications from the land on the one side of the railway to the land on the other, according to an agreement with the owner, &c., or according to the provisions of this act), at all times, for the purpose of occupying the same lands, to pass and repass, and to lead horses, cattle, &c. directly over and across such parts of the railway as shall be made in or upon their lands." By another section it was provided, that the company should, at their own expense, so soon as the railway shall be laid out and formed, make such communications as two or more justices of the peace shall, upon the application of the owners, &c. (in case of any dispute), judge necessary and appoint. Another section prohibited any person from riding, leading, or driving any horse, &c. upon the railway, "except only in directly crossing the same

If any person omit to fasten any gate set up on either side of the railway for accommodation, he is liable to a penalty: (Sect. 75.)

Construction of Accommodation Works.

If the commissioners of a turnpike-road, or the surveyor of any highway, apprehend danger to the passengers on such road, in consequence of horses being frightened by the engines on the railway, application may be made to the Board of Trade, who may certify what works are necessary or proper for the purpose of obviating or lessening the danger (Sect. 63); and the company must make any screen or other work in pursuance of the certificate, or pay a penalty; and the justices who impose the penalty may order it to be applied in executing the work in respect whereof the penalty was incurred: (Sect. 64.) So the Board of Trade may dispense with a strict compliance of the statute in regard to the construction of certain public works of an engineering nature: (Sect. 66.)

Screens.

The company, for the purpose of making the railway, may alter the position of water-pipes, gas-pipes and other obstructions, under the restrictions and penalties prescribed by the act (Sects. 18, 19, 20, 22, 23), making good all damage, and paying compensation: (Sect. 21.)

Interference with water-pipes, gas-pipes, &c.

The foregoing are the principal provisions contained in the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, as to the mode of constructing the railway, and the works connected therewith. The authority of the Board of Trade to sanction deviations in executing certain of the before-mentioned engineering works connected with the railway will be treated of in a subsequent part of this work (d). It now only remains to state in some detail such decided cases as appear to be calculated further to illustrate the subjects we have been considering. They are arranged as follows (e):—

Cases relating to the construction of the railway and stations; and over what lands, and at what levels, the railway may be made.

Cases relating to the construction of bridges.

Cases relating to the diversion, &c. of roads.

Cases relating to the repair of railway works.

as aforesaid, at places to be appointed for that purpose, for the necessary occupation of the respective lands through which the railway shall pass." It was decided that, until the company had made a communication, a party whose land had been severed by the railway had a right to pass from his property on one side of the railway to the other, at any point; and that the words "to be appointed" must be read with the addition of "when such places shall have been appointed." Grand Junction R. Co. v. White, 2 Railw. C. 559.

(e) As the cases are necessarily abbreviated, the remarks made ante, p. 42, note (k), are again suggested. The Editor has not been able consistently with the original plan of this work to shorten the following collection of cases more than he has done. The subsequent cases on the subjects to which they refer have either been already given in the notes to the different sections of the acts, or, where of sufficient importance, in the text; or else are given in the notes to the following cases.

V. Cases relating to Construction of Railway and Works, and over what Lands, and at what Levels, the same may be made.

If a tunnel be marked on the plan, the line cannot be deviated at that point, but the tunnel must be made on the prescribed spot (g).

Little v. Newport and Hereford R. Co. (f). The question was, whether on a line of railway, the company could properly deviate within the limits of deviation, where a tunnel was shown upon the deposited plans.

Jervis, C. J.—I am of opinion that the company cannot deviate where a tunnel is shown. In the reason and sense of this question there is nothing to be said against the construction which the words plainly warrant, because the viaduct, arches and tunnels which are mentioned in the 13th section, and in respect of which there is a specific restriction in the 14th section, are matters of great importance both to the public, as matters of security, and to proprietors in respect of the accommodation of their land, and could not be expected to be made the subject of provisions, in a railway clauses act applicable to all railways, but should be specifically provided for, by contract between the parties, or, if there should be no contract, by legislative provisions, embodied in the special act of Parliament. Therefore in any place where a tunnel was delineated on a plan, it might be consistent with the provisions of the general act, that where a tunnel was originally shown, the special act of Parliament should contain a provision, either to transpose the tunnel if the company deviate, or not to make a tunnel. There is nothing in the act of Parliament, or in the subject-matter with which the act of Parliament deals, which calls for a construction, other than that which is warranted by the exact words of the act of Parliament, because the act is not intended to be a governing act for all railways; it is the basis of a general enactment, to be qualified and limited by a special act of Parliament in each separate case. That being so, we are bound to put such a construction upon the words as they may fairly warrant; we are not bound to strain or vary the meaning of the words. The 13th section is remarkable with respect to the matter, as drawing a distinction between viaducts and works of that sort and tunnels; for it provides, that a tunnel can be dispensed with by consent, whereas a viaduct cannot, according to the legislative meaning of the words. In substance, it provides that where a tunnel is marked on the plan or section as intended to be made at any place, the same shall be made accordingly; and the fair liberal meaning of that is, that where, on the line a tunnel is shown, there, at that place where it is shown, the tunnel shall be made, not within the limits of the line of deviation, but at that place the tunnel shall be made; and if a viaduct is shown on the plan, it shall be made where the viaduct is shown. That this is the meaning of the 13th section, no one who reads the 14th section according to the fair meaning of the words can very much doubt, for it says, it shall not be lawful for the company to deviate or alter a tunnel shown, unless in particular cases, which do not comprehend the case in question. Can any one doubt that a man substantially does deviate as much in the tunnel as he does in the line, if he deviates ninety feet or ninety yards? and certainly a person alters the tunnel, if he does not put it in the place A, but puts it on the side, at place B. It is not then the same tunnel. I think, therefore, it is plain that when there is a tunnel, and where it is shown on the plan at a certain place, there the tunnel must be made, and there must be no deviation or alteration in the position of the tunnel. If that is so, the 15th section must be read with the 13th section: "It shall be lawful for the company to deviate from the line delineated on the plan deposited, within certain limits, except where on the line a tunnel is shown on that plan, and then the tunnel shall be made in that place." If that be so, the 13th, 14th and 15th sections together make a comprehensive and intelligible system, providing that where viaducts or tunnels are shown, there, in that place, they shall be put and not varied or altered; but with that exception, the line may deviate one hundred yards, according to the deviating line shown on the plan. There is no hardship on the company in this. There is no hardship on the landowner; it gives him the exact thing shown on the plan. Both parties, therefore, are justly protected, and no injustice is done; and it seems to me the words of the act of Parliament compel us to arrive at that conclusion. The result is, that the verdict must be entered for the defendants.

Maule, J.—It is to be observed, with respect to the act of Victoria, that it does not profess to make provisions applicable to the construction of all railways, in all respects, and upon every occasion. That would have been impossible, because railways not belonging to a class of immutable things, but each having its own local peculiarities, must require their own individual legislative privileges, and there must necessarily be provisions arising out of their local circumstances which could not, by possibility, be made the subject of general provision. But notwithstanding that this is so, there are many matters relating to railways which are common to almost all railways; and, with respect to such matters, the act of Parliament would seem to be a salutary one in two respects. It shortens the length of the special acts for particular railways, and in furnishing, by way of reference, well understood provisions, applicable to such cases, it lessens the trouble and expense of preparing these acts of Parliament, and by conferring, as far as it is applied, uniformity on them, it makes the decisions that have taken place with respect to one railway applicable with respect to another, which is a great advantage, as it makes the law clear and intelligible. Otherwise, if special provisions were to be carried into effect, by special words in each act, distinctions would be taken, and questions would arise upon each act of Parliament, whether the words were absolutely equivalent, not being quite the same in this act and in others. Questions of that kind are very unsatisfactory and injurious to the administration of justice, and they are prevented by the scope and policy of this act of Parliament, which I think a beneficial one. The effect of that scope is to leave things, fit for local provision, subject to local provision. Now, with respect to tunnels and engineering works generally, it is quite evident that they are fit for such provisions, and any variation or alteration of them that may be required from what is proposed and shown to the public, is a matter almost impossible to be determined by general regulation, and is eminently fit to be the subject of local provision in the special act of Parliament. Accordingly, the general principles laid down, if one chooses to adopt them, are very plain and simple. It is said, in section 13, that where a tunnel is shown upon the plan, it must be made accordingly. It seems, I think, plain enough, that where on a line of railway a tunnel is laid down, you must make the tunnel there. Section 15 throws light on that if it was wanted. It is remarkable how section 14 should escape notice in the matter, for section 14 says, that no engineering work shall be altered or deviated from, except under certain circumstances, which are mentioned, and are of frequent occurrence, and which do not comprehend the case in question. The words have been tried by torture, and I do not think with any degree of success. They have come out of the rack to which they were exposed, with their natural dimensions and force, and they express what they did express before the attempt at twisting them. Section 14 enacts, that where there is an engineering work, such as a tunnel, there shall be no alterations made as to its position, unless the parties choose to provide for it in the special act of Parliament. If they do, they shall provide for something which is applicable in that particular place, to that particular tunnel, and which they well know, but which it would be impossible, without provisions of enormous length and detail, to provide for by the general act. Giving that meaning to the words, it is very clear that if such power of deviating applies to the line as is mentioned in section 15, it would be entirely contradictory to sections 13 and 14, with respect to engineering works, unless you understood that it did not comprehend engineering works. If that is so, as there is no express provision in the local act, the parties must be taken—the company on the one hand and the public on the other—to be satisfied with respect to the tunnels and engineering works, that the company should be bound to make them, as they had laid them down in the original line.

When lands beyond the limits of deviation may be taken for the purposes of a station.

Crauford v. Chester and Holyhead R. Co. (h).—Upon a motion to dissolve an injunction which had been issued, to prevent defendants from taking plaintiff's lands for the purposes of a railway, it appeared that on the plans and in the books of reference deposited by the company, plaintiff's land was marked No. 1 and No. 4, and the line of deviation passed through both lots, leaving part of each outside the line or limit of deviation; and the company served plaintiff with notice, that they required the whole of lots 1 and 4, for the purposes of their acts. Plaintiff, conceiving that the company had no powers to take any land beyond the limits of deviation, declined giving the company possession of those parts beyond the line of deviation. The company thereupon proceeded to take possession thereof, under the compulsory powers of the act, and commenced making a station thereon. Plaintiff thereupon obtained an injunction, to restrain the company from taking or entering upon such parts of his lands as were not within the limits of deviation in the plan deposited. The Vice-Chancellor of England, upon motion, dissolved the injunction. His Honor said, the real question is, whether, attending to the language of the special act, and the paper representing the position of the line deposited with the clerk of the peace, the company have a right to take the whole of the lands with regard to the line of limits of deviation. The act takes notice of a former act, and that it is for the local advantage of the neighbourhood of Chester, that the company should be authorized to extend the line, and construct a new station there. Then the 4th section enacts, that whereas plans and sections for the extension of the said railway, and of the proposed new station, &c., have been deposited with the clerk of the peace, the company shall be at liberty to take lands, &c. Now, I must take it for granted that the legislature considered this special question, whether it might not happen that the line should be altered, so that the whole land specified in the plan might be required to build their station, on the lands marked out on the plans deposited. It appears to me that the legislature thought that right, and they say in this sentence—"It shall be lawful for the company, subject to the powers of deviation in the said Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, to make and amend the said extension, and the said station, and the works connected therewith, in the lines and upon the lands delineated upon the said plans, and described in the said books of reference, and to enter upon, and take and use such of the said lands as shall be necessary for the purpose." This is most singular language, because it speaks originally of the things separately, and by distinct language; but here a notion of combination seemed to have pervaded the minds of those who framed the act. I think you must use your common sense, and see whether the difficulties have not arisen merely from the legislature using consolidating language. Why, if they had said it shall be lawful for them to make and maintain the same station, then there would not have been any doubt. I cannot but think that, inasmuch as the plans show where the station should be placed, it was the intention of the legislature to empower the company to make it on the whole of the land, without attention to the limits of deviation at all. Injunction dissolved.

Cotter v. Midland R. Co. (i).—Motion to dissolve an injunction granted by Wigram, V. C., to restrain defendants from proceeding to assess the amount of compensation to be paid for a piece of land, which was used by the plaintiff as a rope-walk, on which there were several cottages. By the act the company were empowered to make a certain line of railway, including an extension of the main line to the High Orchard Basin at Gloucester; and it was for the purpose of that extension, and the works connected with it, that the land in question was required. The maps and plans deposited showed that two small portions only of the land, at the northern and southern extremities, were wanted for the extension line itself; but the whole was numbered, and the company insisted that the rest was necessary for other purposes, and, amongst others, for the erection of a new station, or an addition to the old one, at the terminus of the original line; and also for sidings on which the waggons employed in the conveyance of goods from the terminus to the basin might wait until there was a sufficient number of them to form a train.

*Cotter v. Midland
R. Co.*

Lord Cottenham, C.—The question between these parties is very simple. The piece of land sought to be taken from the plaintiff by the company is described in the map, plan and book of reference deposited with the clerk of the peace; and the act of the company, after describing the line of railway, authorizes the company to make and maintain the railway and works thereby authorized, in the line, and in the manner after provided; and, after reciting the deposit of the plan, section, and books of reference, authorizes the company to make and maintain the railway and works, in the line and upon the lands delineated upon the said plans, and described in the said book of reference, and to enter upon, take and use such of the said lands as shall be necessary for such purpose.

The plaintiffs do not dispute the right of the defendants to take so much of this piece of land as may be required for forming the line of railway, but deny their right to take any part which exceeds what is wanted for that purpose, although required by the company for the purposes of the railway, in forming or enlarging a station, and in forming places for carriages to collect and wait till the trains are ready to start, no part of which, they contend, is authorized by the act: and that is the whole question; which must be decided by the words of the act, with the interpretation of such words, either in the interpretation clause or by the provisions of the act, or of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act.

The authority is, to take and use so much of the land in question as shall be necessary for the purpose of making and maintaining the said railway and works.

The Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, in the 3rd section, declares that the expression "railway" shall mean the railway and works by the special act authorized to be constructed. [His lordship read the 16th and 45th sections of the same act.]

There are no more distinct provisions in the special act, or in the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, authorizing the formation of stations or other buildings and con-conveniences, which are essential to the working of all railways; and if these provisions do not include such a power, Parliament has authorized the extension of the railway in a manner likely to produce a great increase of traffic, without any power to make those arrangements, which such additional traffic will render indispensable. It seems to me, however, sufficiently clear that these provisions do include ample power for these purposes. The term "railway" by itself includes all works authorized to be constructed; and for the purpose of constructing the railway, the company are authorized to construct such stations and other works as they may think proper; and assuming that the lands authorized to be compulsorily taken would be taken and used for all ordinary stations and works, the act provides that, for extraordinary purposes, such as additional stations and conveniences, this railway may purchase certain additional quantities of land. I consider that all land, authorized to be taken, as necessary, in the terms of the act, for the purpose of making and maintaining the railway and works, is liable to be so taken, whether necessary for the actual line of the railway, or for stations or other conveniences necessary for the working of the railway; and the purposes for which the plaintiff's land is proposed to be applied clearly fall within that description.

Such, indeed, appears to have been the construction assumed and adopted in several cases. If, in Eton College v. Great Western R., and Lord Petre v. Eastern Counties R. (k), the company could not have formed stations without special authority, what was the necessity of introducing special prohibitions, and why were the judgments of the courts confined to such special prohibitions, when, according to the plaintiff's argument, the companies would, for want of special authority, have been incompetent to construct such stations? The motion for the injunction must be refused with costs.

Richards v. Scarborough Public Market Co.

Richards v. Scarborough Public Market Co. (l).—A market company obtained a special act, which recited that a convenient site for a market-house might be obtained, between certain streets on the east, and certain other streets on the west; and after incorporating the Market and Fairs Clauses Act, by sect. 24 authorized the erection of a market-house on land described in the deposited plans; and by sect. 25, the company were enabled to alter and widen streets, in the way pointed out on the deposited plans; and by sect. 30, to buy additional lands, not exceeding two acres. Plaintiff was the owner of a shop and premises on the west side of the street, precisely opposite to the entrance of the intended market-house. The whole of plaintiff's premises was numbered and delineated on the parliamentary plan deposited with the clerk of the peace; but it did not appear from the plan that any part of plaintiff's lands were intended to be built upon, or used by the company, except such part as was required for the purpose of widening the street. The company gave notice to plaintiff that they required the whole of his land for the purposes of their act; and subsequently issued their warrant to the sheriff to assess the value in the usual manner, in order that they might take it compulsorily. It was alleged that the intention of the company was to build two market-houses, one on each side of the street. The plaintiff thereupon obtained an injunction, Sir J. Romilly, M. R., being clearly of opinion that the statute did not authorize the company to take the whole of the plaintiff's premises (m). But, upon appeal, the injunction was dissolved.

Sir Knight Bruce, L. J.—The plaintiff says that the company are not entitled to take his land, and that if they are strictly entitled to take it, they intend to apply it for purposes not authorized by the act. The company were authorized to take the ground for erecting a market-house, stalls, and slaughter-houses, mentioned in the book of reference. It is manifest that the plaintiff's land may be wanted, because it is included in the plan; and it is probable that it may still be wanted for the purposes of the act. There is no reason to suppose the company intended to use the plaintiff's land for any foreign purpose. As to the term "market-house," the General Market Clauses Consolidation Act says, that "the singular may mean plural unless repugnant." It is not uncommon, for part of a market to be under roof, and a part not under it, but still one market. The plan, it has been said, shows that the market-house should be only on the east of the street, and, therefore, it cannot be made on the west; and the recital in the act has also been relied on. As to the first, the reference to the general act is an answer; and as to the recital, the enactments are not so limited; and here there is no necessity to refer to the recital to explain the general intention. Unless such a course be necessary, it is not warranted. Here, the true construction of the act needs no such aid, and the act cannot be restricted by the recital. The plaintiff has failed in establishing that the company are attempting to take his land for foreign purposes, and the defendants may go on with their works.

Sir G. Turner, L. J.—I also am of opinion that this injunction must be dissolved. By the act of Parliament, the company have power to make such buildings, shops, &c., upon any of the lands, as they may think proper, and they are to be the proper judges of what is necessary. We must discharge the order, and dissolve the injunction.

Eton College v. Great Western R. Co. (n).—A bill for the formation of a railway was pending in the Lords. In consequence of a petition presented by Eton College the following clauses were introduced:—Sect. 99, that it should not be lawful for the company to alter or divert any part of the line of railway as then laid down, nor to make any other railway, tramroad or other road or way to the south of the line, within three miles of Eton. Sect. 100, that it should not be lawful for any company or person to form, make or lay down any branch railway or tramroad, or other road or way whatever, passing or approaching within the same limits. Sect. 101, that no depot, station, yard, waiting, watering, loading or unloading place should be made within the same distance. Sects. 102 and 104, that the company should erect and maintain a fence on each side of the railway, within certain parishes, for a distance of four miles; and should maintain a police for preventing all access to the railway by the scholars of Eton. The company diverted an existing road within the prescribed distance, and fenced off and appropriated part of the site of such former road as a passage communicating with the railway, by which passengers were invited to pass on foot to and from and to be taken up and set down by the trains stopping at the end of such passage. They also hired two rooms in a public-house, erected at the entrance of such passage, and the same were used as a booking-office and waiting-place, in the same manner as the station-houses of the company were used.

Shadwell, V.-C., decided, that the act did not prohibit the company from taking up and setting down passengers at that place, and his judgment was affirmed, on appeal, by Lord Cottenham, C., who was also of opinion that there was no parliamentary contract between the parties, and that the company were entitled to exercise the powers given by the act, in any manner not therein prohibited; that the passage was not a road within the 100th section; and that the house was not a station or waiting-place within the 101st section.

Meaning of the words "public station or other buildings."

Gordon v. Cheltenham and G. W. R. Co.

Gordon v. Cheltenham and Great Western Union R. Co. (o).]—A railway act enacted "that it should not be lawful for the company to make or establish any public station, yards, wharfs, waiting, loading or unloading places, warehouses or other buildings and conveniences for the depositing, receiving, loading or keeping any passengers or cattle, or any goods, articles, matters or things upon the estate of G., or within fifty yards of the boundaries thereof." G. filed a bill to restrain the company from using an engine-house and other buildings erected by them within the prescribed limits:—Held, by the Master of the Rolls, that the word "public" did not necessarily override the whole sentence; and that, if it did, everything connected with the railway must be considered as for the public use; and the injunction was granted, but with liberty to apply for a rehearing, or to prosecute an appeal to the House of Lords.

Where land was sold to a railway company upon condition that "the whole of the land should be appropriated to and solely for the purposes of the railway and the buildings connected therewith:—Held, that it was no breach of the condition to erect a building used chiefly by the passengers on the railway, with a room appropriated as a custom house, to which persons not travelling by the railway occasionally resorted.

Warden of Dover Harbour v. South-Eastern R. Co.

Warden of Dover Harbour v. South-Eastern R. Co. (p).]—Injunction to restrain defendants from using a building as a custom-house, and for the accommodation of their passengers. It appeared that defendants' act contained a clause "that no erection or building should be made without the consent of plaintiffs, or their surveyor, on certain land conveyed by them to the company, exceeding the respective heights therein specified;" and by sect. 15, "that the whole of the land to be sold by plaintiff to the company should be appropriated to and used solely for the purposes of the railway and the buildings connected therewith, except such part as might be required by the Board of Ordnance, or might be necessary to be left open for the increased width of the streets to form the necessary approaches to the railway station: provided always, that the said ground should not be used or employed for building or erecting thereon any coke ovens, or for any other purposes (the necessary railway purposes only excepted), by which any nuisance might be created or the other property of the plaintiff in any way damaged. Plaintiff's bill stated that the company erected the present building, and that one part of it was used as a custom-house for examining the luggage of passengers, collecting duties, granting certificates to aliens, &c.; that the upper floors of the building were laid out and intended to be used as bed-rooms in connection with an hotel erected by the company, on ground held by them on lease, and which, if so used, would be to the injury of plaintiff's property, consisting of several hotels in Dover, and to prevent which injury the stipulation in the above act had been inserted.

Sir G. Turner, V.-C.—This question wholly depends on the 15th section of the act. Now what are the purposes and object of that section? I think the primary object is the laying out of the land purchased by the company, and I think so for this reason: the words of the clause are not that the whole of the land or ground to be sold to the company, and the buildings thereon, shall be appropriated to and used solely for the purposes of the railway, but that the land or ground to be sold shall be appropriated solely to and for the purposes of the railway and the buildings connected therewith. It is, therefore, the use of the land and ground at which the clause properly looks; and, on the second branch of the clause, I think the same view arises. It is "except such part or portion thereof as may be required by the Board of Ordnance, &c." Still looking, not to the use of the buildings to be erected on the land, but to the mode in which the land is to be laid out or applied. The proviso seems to bear the same construction. Looking at this clause, with that view, I think that this question really depends upon the narrow words which are contained in the clause, "and the buildings connected therewith:" and the first question is, what is the principle to be applied to the construction of this clause? This is a purchase, in effect a deed of conveyance under a parliamentary power, to sell to a party as owner in fee; and, therefore, every sound construction requires that the restriction which is imposed upon the owner in fee shall not be enlarged or extended beyond its necessary limits. What is the meaning, then, of the words "buildings connected therewith." I quite agree with the construction that "connected therewith" means connected with the railway; and there are three meanings which may be attached to those words. They may mean locally connected with the railway; or connected with the railway in the sense in which other buildings are connected with other railways, or connected with the railway as buildings applicable to that particular railway. I concur with the plaintiff's argument upon that point, that they do not mean locally connected with the railway. Do they then mean buildings connected with this railway, in the same sense as other buildings connected with other railways? I do not think that that limited construction can be put on them. I think this must be read "for the purposes of the said railway and the buildings connected with such particular railway." It follows to be considered what is, within the language of this clause, properly a building connected with the particular railway. I really do not know what construction can be put upon, or what meaning can be attached to, the words, "buildings connected with the railway," unless it be buildings which are used in some portion, or in some sense, for the purposes of the railway. How, then, does the case stand with reference to these buildings being or not being used for the purposes of the railway? Why the fact, so far as it relates to the custom-house, is, that one of the rooms is exclusively appropriated for the use of the custom-house. But by the side of that room there is another room, in which the passengers wait, whilst their luggage is being examined by the custom-house officers; and on the other side there is another room, into which the luggage, after it has been examined, is passed from the centre room, and then the luggage is separated by the town porters, and it is handed over a rail to porters who carry it, either to the railway or to any other place. Now is that building, so used, connected with the railway? It is a building which, to some extent at least, is used for the purposes of the railway. Can I then say that a building which is, to a certain extent, used for the purposes of the railway, is not to be considered as a building connected with the railway, because other purposes are added to the use of it, and because in that building are examined, not merely the luggage of passengers who pass along the railway, but the luggage of other persons who may not leave Dover, or who may go to hotels in the town? I do not think it is a fair and reasonable construction to hold, that because a building is used, and principally used, for the purpose of examining the luggage of passengers coming from abroad, and passing along the railway, it therefore follows that it is not a building used for the purposes connected with the railway. I think, that being the primary purpose, I should not be justified in holding this use of the building to be such as the act of Parliament does not authorize. As to the bed-rooms, I think the same argument that applies to the one applies also to the other. I am not prepared to say that there may not, hereafter, be such a use of these bed-rooms as would induce this court to interfere; but as the case at present stands there is no evidence before me, that there is any intention to use them for any such purposes as would warrant me in holding that the building is not, bonâ fide, intended to be used, and to be considered as a building connected with the railway.—Injunction refused.

v. Eastern Coun-

E. R. Co., empowered them to construct arches over the railway or other works, streets, &c., and upon the railway, or any lands adjoining or near thereto, to erect stations. By another act the company were empowered to provide a station and depôt near the London terminus of the railway; and all the "clauses, powers, provisions, directions, regulations," &c., contained in the former act, should apply to the purchase of land and buildings for the railway, and also for the station, and nothing in that act should extend to prejudice, derogate from, &c., the privileges of any parish over which the said railroad shall pass, under local acts of Parliament.

The railway company having arched over a street for the purpose of building a station, the Lord Chancellor directed a case to be sent to the Court of Exchequer. The following certificate was sent to the Court of Chancery:—"We are of opinion, that the N. and E. R. Co. were entitled, if it was necessary or reasonably convenient for the construction of a station and proper warehouses, to construct and make coverings or buildings, by arches or otherwise, over the public streets mentioned in the case, in like manner as they were entitled to do for the construction of the railway itself; and that by their last act of Parliament, they were expressly authorized to construct such station and warehouses at or near High-street, Shore-ditch."

A railway may be constructed along a navigable river according to deposited plans: and upon an action for the obstruction, brought by persons accustomed to navigate the river, it is not incumbent on the company to show, that they have purchased the portion of the bed of the river, used for the railway, from the owner.

Abraham v. Great Northern R. Co.

Abraham v. Great Northern R. Co. (r).]—Action on the case by owners of vessels navigating the Ouse. The declaration charged defendants with filling up and obstructing part of the bed of that river, penning back water, and preventing it flowing in its accustomed channel, and preventing plaintiffs from navigating that part of the river. Defendants pleaded that they had done the things complained of under the special and consolidated acts for making their railway; that plans and books of reference were deposited with the clerk of the peace; that the part of the bed of the river which was obstructed was among the lands delineated in the plans, and described in the books of reference, and that the works done were necessary for the purpose of making the railway. Upon the trial, before Patteson, J., it was contended, that under this plea defendants were bound, not only to show that the part of the river obstructed was in the plans and books of reference, and was used for the necessary construction of the railway; but also that all notices required by the acts for the purchase of such part of the river, from the owners of the bed of it, had been given, and all other things done, which were requisite to vest that part of the bed of the river in the company. The judge told the jury that the allegations in the plea did not make such proof necessary, and they found a verdict for defendants. A rule for a new trial was afterwards obtained; also for judgment non obstante veredicto, on the ground that if the judge was right in his construction of the plea, the plea was bad for the want of averments, that those various acts had been done, which, it has been insisted, ought to have been proved; and further upon the ground, that none of the acts of Parliament authorized the company to construct their railway upon the bed of the navigable part of the river.

Patteson, J.—We are of opinion that the learned judge was right in the construction which he put upon the plea: and therefore that there is no ground for granting a new trial. With respect to judgment non obstante veredicto, we are of opinion that, as against the plaintiffs, who have no interest in the soil of the bed of the river, but have only the right of passage on the navigable highway, common to all the Queen's subjects, it was not necessary for the defendants to aver and prove, that they had taken the proper steps to vest in them the ownership of the bed of the river. If they were entitled by the acts of Parliament to convert a portion of the navigable river into a railway, and so to obstruct and do away with a portion of the navigable channel, it cannot be material to the public at large, or to those persons who were in the habit of navigating that portion, whether the ownership of the bed of the river in that portion has been effectually transferred, or whether any one entitled to compensation in respect of such ownership has or has not been satisfied.

The remaining question is, whether the defendants were authorized by any act of Parliament to construct their railway upon the bed of the navigable part of the river. The act on which the defendants relied is 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 16 [this section was read, see ante, 168]. The company have here constructed an embankment and road in and upon the river, described in the plan and mentioned in the books of reference. The word "rivers" is here used without any qualification, and would seem therefore to include navigable rivers, as well as rivers not navigable, especially as the word "roads," here also used, plainly includes highways, along which the public have fully as extensive a right of passage as they have along navigable rivers. Other provisions are introduced into the act, as to the mode of using roads, but none as to the mode of using navigable rivers. Whether such provisions were intentionally omitted, and, if so, for what reason we cannot tell; but we cannot see that such omission justifies us in qualifying the meaning of the word "river" in this clause, or in effect adding the words "not navigable," which are not to be found in the clause itself. The plans and books of reference would be before the legislature, when the special act for constructing their railway was passed; and although it may be true, as was suggested, that no particular individual felt so much interest in opposing the act, by reason of the insertion of a portion of this navigable river in such plans and books, as to make it a subject of controversy during the progress of the act, yet we are not warranted in supposing that the legislature overlooked such insertion, or in limiting the operation of the plain words which the legislature has employed. The subsequent part of the clause in question was relied on by the plaintiffs, which provides that the company may "alter the course of any rivers not navigable within such lands, for the purpose of constructing and maintaining tunnels, bridges, passages or other works over or under the same, and divert or alter, as well temporarily as permanently, the course of any such rivers, in order the more conveniently to carry the same over or under or by the side of the railway, as they may think proper;" and it was urged that the legislature manifestly intended to confine the power of diverting and altering the course of rivers to those which are not navigable, which would be entirely frustrated if the word "rivers," in the prior part of the clause, were held to include navigable rivers, since the language used in that prior part is so comprehensive as to include the power of diverting and altering the course of the rivers there mentioned. But we think that this reasoning is not sound. The prior part of the clause gives only the power of constructing works in and upon rivers, within the lands described in the plans and books of reference; yet we think not so as to divert or alter the entire course of such rivers, or to obstruct the whole navigation of them if navigable; for we cannot suppose that the legislature would permit such lands to be included in the plans and books of reference, as would enable the company so to divert or alter the entire course of navigable rivers, or to obstruct the entire navigation of them. But the latter part of the clause, which does apply to such entire diversion and alteration of the course of rivers, is expressly confined to those which are not navigable. The one contemplates the appropriation of a part of the river to the uses of the railway, leaving the residue of it in its usual course, and the navigation of that residue unimpeded where it is a navigable river. The other contemplates the entire destruction of the old course. The erecting anything in a navigable river, or upon a highway, which would be a nuisance if not authorized by act of Parliament, cannot, by any reasonable construction of language, be considered as a diverting or altering the course of such river or highway. No doubt such an erection in a navigable river, by preventing the water from flowing at all, along the site of the erection, would prevent the water of the river from flowing in its accustomed channel and course, in so ample a manner as it otherwise would have done, which is the language used in this declaration; but that is a very different thing from diverting or altering the course of the river, within the meaning of the statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20. For these reasons we are of opinion that the plea is sufficient.—Rule discharged.

Where the power of fully completing a railway depends, by the words of the act, on the voluntary consent of land-owners, such consent must be obtained.

Gray v. Liverpool and Bury R. Co.

Gray v. Liverpool and Bury R. Co. (s).—Motion for injunction. Plaintiffs were owners of lands and cotton-mills erected thereon, in the line of a proposed railway; and, according to the original plan, the railway would pass directly through several of plaintiffs' buildings, and the gort and feeder by which their mills were supplied with water. Plaintiffs opposed the application for the act of Parliament, in the Commons, and it was ultimately agreed that the following clause should be introduced into the bill for the plaintiffs' protection, and the opposition was withdrawn.—“And whereas J. G. and W. G. are the owners and occupiers of certain mills, lands and buildings, situate at D., through which the line of the railway, as delineated on the plans and sections, passes, it shall not be lawful for the company, without the consent of the said J. G. and W. G., or the owners for the time being, to construct the railway nearer to the same mills, lands and buildings, or any of them, than the south-east end of L. Bridge, delineated on the said plans, and therein numbered 1.”

By another section it was enacted, “That the company shall not, in or during the construction or progress of the railway or works, divert, obstruct or in any way injure the gorts of the said J. G. and W. G., connected with their works at D., and in the plan and book of reference of the company referred to, under the penalty of 50*l.* for each day of the occurrence of such diversion, &c.,” to be paid them above the damage actually sustained, nor shall the company, during the construction of the railway or works, “obstruct the carrying on of the said works of the said J. G. and W. G. under the like penalty,” &c.

The defendants conceived, that according to the intention of the first-mentioned section, they were authorized to construct the railway, without the consent of the plaintiffs, upon any line not nearer, on the south side, to the line originally laid down, than a line parallel thereto, drawn through the southernmost part of the east end of L. Bridge; and they accordingly gave the ordinary notices, and were proceeding, without plaintiffs' consent, to construct their railway in a line parallel to the original line, at the distance named, but passing through some of the lands belonging to plaintiffs, which, however, were separated from the lands on which their works were situated by a public road.

Plaintiffs thereupon applied for an injunction to restrain defendants from constructing the railway “nearer to the mills, lands and buildings than the south-east end of L. Bridge,” and from entering, &c. upon plaintiffs' said lands and property, nearer than the south-east end of L. Bridge.

Lord Langdale, M. R., on granting the injunction said, There is a collective description in the words “mills, lands and buildings;” they include the whole and every part of those premises of which J. G. and W. G. were the owners and occupiers. They were the owners and occupiers of the whole which is delineated on the map, and the railway is not to be constructed nearer than the south-east end of the bridge, which bridge crosses the river Tonge, and is immediately continued by the road, which has on both sides a portion of those lands. The words in themselves do not seem to me to be attended with any difficulty. They mean "you shall not come nearer to my estate than the bridge." It has been argued that that cannot be the construction; and the only question is, whether there is anything to overcome that which is the plain and natural construction of these words. In the first place it is said, that this construction would make the construction of the railway dependent altogether on the will of Messrs. G. That does not in itself seem very absurd, though it is said to be so, because, it is argued, the whole scope of the act clearly manifests that, at all events, there was to be a railway constructed. How is that? A railway is to be constructed to be sure, but subject to the provisions in the act, and this is one; the railway is not, therefore, to be constructed at all events, but only subject to the provisions of the act, including among others this clause, and not otherwise. Then it is said you must give a restricted meaning to the words "mills, lands and buildings," and that they must mean either those mills, lands and buildings which are employed in the factory, and which give the particular special value to the property, or those strictly cut by the line of railway, as originally designed, or they must have some other restricted meaning. I must say I do not find anything to convince me that this was the intention of both parties. As to the arguments used about the legislature intending this or that, I think nothing of them. The legislature had no object, but to provide that there should be an agreement between the parties, and that the railway should be constructed, provided this agreement should be made.

Upon appeal Lord Lyndhurst, C., directed the question, as to the legal rights of the parties in this case, to be tried at law.

Lancaster and Carlisle R. Co. v. Maryport and Carlisle R. Co. (t).—Defendants obtained an act for making certain branch railways, and it was provided that nothing therein contained should extend to prejudice, diminish, alter or take away any of the rights, privileges, powers or authorities vested in plaintiffs under their act, but all rights, privileges and franchises of the company, and all the powers, authorities and provisions in the said last-mentioned act contained, were saved and reserved to them as if defendants' act had not been passed; so always nevertheless that such rights, &c., be not exercised in such a manner as to prevent defendants from compulsorily taking land of sufficient breadth to admit of the formation of the extensions thereinbefore authorized, such extensions, however, not to exceed respectively twenty-two feet in breadth, with sufficient breadth for the necessary slopes.

Plaintiffs were empowered by their act to take certain lands compulsorily, and also to take certain other lands with consent. Defendants had power to take compulsorily certain lands scheduled in their act, amongst which were certain pieces of land which plaintiffs had purchased, with consent of the owners, subsequently to the date of defendants' act.

Defendants gave notice of their intention to take compulsorily a greater quantity of the land purchased by plaintiffs than was required for the line of their railway for stations, &c., whereupon plaintiffs applied for an injunction to restrain defendants from taking more of their land than was necessary for their line of railway.

Shadwell, V. C., granted the injunction, on the ground that plaintiffs, having occupied the ground before defendants, were entitled to hold so much of it as was not actually wanted for the formation of defendants' railway: and said, "The rule applied to the construction of wills is, that the last part controls the first, and so I must treat it with respect to this act of Parliament. In the first instance, the first section gave very general powers, for it declared that, for the purposes of the company, they should have all the powers given by their former act, 'save and except such of them as are by this act repealed, altered, or otherwise provided for'; so that in the very first section in which they give the general power, they put a very general restriction by the words that I have last used. The next section applies to the extension, and nothing turns on the construction of that section, because the consent was actually given with respect to the plaintiffs taking the lands."

The sixth section says, "that the company, in making the said extensions and branch railways, shall not have power to deviate to the westward from the line delineated on the plan, or to go through any land which either of these companies have contracted to purchase, or have power under their respective acts of Parliament to purchase." Now there is nothing said about a compulsory power, the words are only "power to purchase;" and if the defendants, exercising as they thought fit sufficient astuteness, have not taken care to contract to purchase, or to purchase this land, but have left them open to be contracted for, or to be purchased by the plaintiffs, they have, if I may use an expression peculiar to a certain game, left a blot which the other side took care, when they had the throw, to pick up, and the consequence was that these words of exception have given, unexpectedly I dare say to the defendants, an advantage to the plaintiffs which the defendants did not foresee.

VI. Cases relating to the Construction of Bridges.

Construction of a special act as to the right to erect a temporary bridge across a canal.

London and Birmingham R. Co. v. Grand Junction Canal Co.

London and Birmingham R. Co. v. Grand Junction Canal Co. (u).]—A company were empowered by an act to do all works necessary and convenient for constructing a railway, and, among others, to cross canals and make embankments in the line; and, in particular, to cross a canal of which defendants were proprietors, and to make an embankment over a valley near the same place. Subsequent clauses in the act restricted the company from doing anything which should obstruct the navigation of the canal; and specified the height and dimensions of any bridge to be made and maintained for carrying the railway over the canal. The company, for the purpose of transporting earth from the higher lands on the south to the lower lands on the north side of the canal, for constructing an embankment, erected a temporary bridge over the canal, supported partly on piles driven into the bed of the canal. Defendants pulled down such bridge, and thereby destroyed the passage of communication for the carriage of the earth. It was decided by Sir C. C. Pepys, M. R., on a motion for an injunction to restrain defendants from destroying such bridge, that the clause empowering the railway company to cross canals in the progress of their works was not restricted by the subsequent clauses, which applied to permanent bridges; and his Honor restrained defendants from obstructing the making or use of such passage of communication.

Semble.—Although a railway company are not to act capriciously in regard to carrying out the powers of an act of Parliament, the act constitutes them the judges of the most convenient mode of conducting their works.

If a railway company are authorized to erect a temporary bridge for a particular purpose, they

Priestly v. Manchester and Leeds R. Co. (x).]—The Manchester and Leeds R. Act, sect. 34, reciting that the railway was to be carried across the Aire and Calder Navigation at three specified places, required the company to erect bridges, and prescribed the dimensions of such bridges. Sect. 38 provided that the company should, during the progress of constructing such bridges, leave an open, uninterrupted navigable waterway, of a specified height and extent. Sects 42 and 44 provided that the railway company should not make any bridge over the navigation, and, generally, should not interfere therewith otherwise than as provided for by the act. Sect. 94 empowered the company, subject to the restrictions imposed by the act, to make and maintain the railway, and to construct in, under, upon, across, or over any hills, valleys, roads, rivers, canals, brooks or streams, or other waters, such embankments, bridges, aqueducts and conduits, either temporary or permanent, and to erect and construct such buildings, engines, machinery, apparatus, and other works and conveniences, as the company should think proper.

By an agreement made between the companies, and afterwards embodied in an act, the line of railway was changed, by which the navigation was crossed only once by the railway, and only one bridge required. The railway company had introduced into the agreement a clause enabling them to erect temporary bridges across the navigation, but which was struck out by the navigation company. The railway company, having commenced the building of the permanent bridge, erected a temporary bridge adjoining to the permanent bridge, which was used partly for building that bridge and partly for conveying materials across the river. An injunction was granted ex parte, restraining the erection of a temporary bridge across the navigation, or of anything impeding the navigation in a manner not authorized by the act. Upon motion to dissolve the injunction, it was decided that, subject to the restrictions of the act, the 94th section ought to be literally carried into effect; that the railway company had the power of erecting such a temporary bridge, the power being exercised reasonably and bonâ fide; that in construing such power with a view to its reasonable and bonâ fide exercise, regard must be had to the peculiar purpose for which the permanent bridge was designed; that the temporary bridge, being of the dimensions specified in the 34th section, and a navigable waterway being left, as required by the 38th section, the same was lawfully erected under the 94th section, for the bonâ fide purpose of building the permanent bridge; that the temporary bridge, being erected and used for a lawful purpose, might also be used for other purposes, for which alone it could not have been erected; and that, subject to the restrictions of the act, the company, acting bonâ fide, were constituted the judges of the mode of executing their works.—Injunction dissolved.

Priestly v. Manchester and Leeds R. Co.

Manser v. Northern and Eastern Counties R. Co. (y).]—A company proposed to cross a mill-stream by a bridge, to be supported in the centre of the mill-stream by two piles, placed sixteen feet apart. The bridge was to be six feet in height above the level of the water. Plaintiff asserted that the height was insufficient to allow barges to pass under, and that placing piles in the stream would impede the flow of water, and stop the working of the mill. The company alleged that the nature of the ground prevented them from making the bridge of a greater height; and that, over a navigable river, connected with the mill-stream, there were some bridges only six feet high; and that, at the time of the passing of their act, there was over this mill-stream a bridge of that height, though such bridge had since been pulled down by plaintiff, and re-erected of a greater height; and that the flow of the water would be in no way impeded by the piles. Plaintiff alleged, that although some of the bridges over the navigable river were of the height of six feet, yet that the water under them could be lowered by waste-gates; that to obtain a perfect level on the line of the railway, the embankments, and consequently the bridge over the mill-stream, ought to be raised two feet. Shadwell, V. C., decided that plaintiff was not entitled to require the company to build the bridge at the height of more than six feet. The plaintiff appealed.

Lord Cottenham, C.—I feel, as I have in all these cases, that I myself am much less capable to make an order that would be perfectly just between the parties, than might be obtained by calling in some professional assistance, who would state to me what the result of the affidavits is, on the exercise of that engineering science which I do not possess, even if certified as to the facts. But I have no doubt whatever upon the construction of the act. The company undoubtedly have powers to take land, if they think proper, within the limits prescribed by the act; and I will assume that they have a right to adopt any level which they please; but then they cannot do that capriciously; and, having got into a certain level, they cannot part with that level, and come down on the plaintiff's stream of water, and destroy the interest in that stream of water, without some very cogent reason for so doing. The only way to try that is to take a case, and I will take this case. Here they say they have left sufficient space, and have not so interfered with the water, as to create a damage to the parties interested in the navigation of it; but if that be the construction of the act, they had a right to come down and destroy the navigation, or to bring their bridge so close to the surface of the water as entirely to impede the navigation. That could not be done, except in cases of extreme necessity; and the act has clearly and carefully, and also very intelligibly, laid down the rule that they are to follow. They may do what is necessary for the purpose of carrying through the works which the act authorizes them to carry on, but, in doing that, they must do as little damage as may be. If they cannot carry on the works without doing certain damage, if it is land, they are bound to purchase it; if it is not land, but some interest which is affected by it, they are bound to compensate the party in money; but if the damage to be done is not a necessary consequence of the works they are to carry on, then this court, being apprised of what is in progress, will interpose to prevent it: because, in that case, it is an excess of the power given by the act; the act only authorizing them to carry on their works, doing as little damage as may be. If they think proper to carry on the works, doing more damage than the necessity of the case requires, then the court will interfere. That being the construction which I have always put on these acts, and which, I believe, all other judges have done, the question is, whether this case comes within that rule of construction. I find in this case, certainly, a very peculiar state of facts, because I find the railroad proceeding up to certain points on each side of the locus in quo on a certain level, and then the level is altered, and assumes a lower level, and is gradually lowered, until it reaches the particular point in question, which I understand to be the lowest point of the level on which the railroad runs; and from this particular point it rises to the level which it pursues in other places. I certainly have not been at all satisfied of the existence of the necessity that the company should adopt that course. [His lordship then proposed a reference to an engineer of eminence; and the case was ultimately compromised.]

Attorney-General v. London and Southampton R. Co. Sect. 74 provided, that, where any bridge should be erected by the company for the purpose of carrying the railway over or across any turnpike road or other public highway, the span of the arch should be of such width as to leave a clear and open space under every such arch of not less than fifteen feet. Sect. 77 provided, that where, in the exercise of the powers of the act, any part of any carriage or horse-road, either public or private, should be found necessary to be cut through, diverted, raised, sunk, taken, or so much injured as to be impassable, the company should previously thereto cause a sufficient road to be made instead thereof, as convenient for passengers and carriages as the road to be cut through, or as near thereto as might be. The company erected a bridge over a turnpike road, at a place where the width of the then existing road was forty feet; and, owing to such bridge crossing the road obliquely, and to the piers of the bridge being built on the road, the passage under the arch of the bridge left a width of road of twenty-four feet only for a distance of 160 feet. Held, by Shadwell, V. C., that the restrictions imposed by sect. 77 applied only to a case where a road might be either temporarily or permanently diverted; that, under sect. 9, the company were empowered to erect any piers or necessary buildings for a bridge, provided they left a width under such bridge of fifteen feet, as provided for by sect. 74.

Cases.Construction of Bridges.

Attorney-General v. London and Southampton R. Co.

R. v. Manchester and Leeds R. Co. (a).—By an act a company were empowered to divert, raise, sink or deepen any roads, to carry the same over, under or by the side of the railway, subject to the provisions and restrictions of the act. By another act they were authorized (sect. 38) to carry the line of railway across a certain turnpike road by means of a bridge of the width of thirty feet at the least, and for that purpose to lower the then present bed of the road, but in so doing were required to leave a certain inclination on each side of the bridge, and headway under it, and to re-lay and re-form the road. The company made a bridge thirty feet wide, over a turnpike road forty-two feet wide, consisting of thirty feet carriage way, and two footways of six feet each. They lowered the carriage way of the road, but left the footways at their original level. On the trial of certain traverses to a return to a mandamus which had issued, requiring the company to re-form the road, and to lower it the whole width of forty-two feet, the jury found, 1st, that the company had not so lowered the road; 2nd, that they had re-formed the road, in compliance with the act; and 3rd, that the road so made by the company was more commodious to the public than if the whole road had been lowered to the full width of forty-two feet. The Queen's Bench decided (b), that "road" meant the whole road, including footpaths, and therefore that the company had not re-formed the road as required by the act; and that the finding of the jury as to its being more commodious was not sufficient to dispense with a compliance with the act; but, upon error in the Exchequer Chamber, the judgment on the first point was reversed.

Construction of special act as to width of a road under a railway bridge.

R. v. Manchester and Leeds R. Co.

Tindal, C. J., said,—The main question in the case arose, viz., whether the company were bound to excavate the road to the full width of the former road. The question is, whether the expression in the 38th section, "the bed of the said turnpike road," is confined to that part of the road which, in another part of the same section, is called the carriage road, or whether it comprises not only the carriage road, but the footpath also. And we are of opinion that, looking to the object and purpose for which the bed of the turnpike road is directed to be lowered, the statute intends no more by that expression than the carriage road. But a further question remains; and it was urged, that the carriage road ought at all events to be lowered to the full width of the former carriage road, which is found not to have been done. If the section had contained any express enactment to that effect, it could not be contended that the superior convenience to the public of the road so made would furnish an excuse for a deviation from the express enactment of the statute; but it is admitted, that there is no express provision to this effect; nor does it appear to us that there is any sufficient ground for holding that such a provision is to be implied.

R. v. Rigby (c).]—Indictment against contractors employed by a railway company, for obstructing a turnpike road, by building on it the piers of a railway bridge, and narrowing it thereby. All the counts in the indictment charged the nuisance to be to the carriage road, but nothing was said about the foot road. For forty years before the building of the bridge, the average width of the carriage road, for fifty yards on each side of the spot where the bridge was erected, was twenty-eight feet, and the footpath on one side was eight feet three inches, and on the other, seven feet three inches. The piers of the bridge stood on the footpath on each side; they were each four feet wide, and were built parallel to the line of the carriage road, not directly opposite to each other, as the bridge was a skew bridge. The effect was, that the carriage road remained as it was before, twenty-eight feet wide, but the footpaths were each narrowed; and the carriage road and footpaths together, which formerly were forty-three feet six inches, were only thirty-six feet. These were the dimensions stated in the case; but if the piers occupy eight feet, it would follow that the total width was only thirty-five feet six inches. Whether the difference of six inches could be accounted for by the circumstance of the piers not being directly opposite to each other, did not appear. These facts were stated on a special case, and after taking time to consider, Patteson, J., said: The prosecutors relied much on the 19th section of the special local act (9 & 10 Vict. c. ccxxxiv), which provides, "that in every case in which the railway shall cross the road otherwise than at right angles, the bridges shall be made with skew arches, so as not in any manner to alter the direction of, or interfere with the line of the said roads, or the footpaths to the same." The object of this section is plain, namely, to prevent the railway company from turning or bending the road, so as to carry it at right angles under any bridge over which the railway passes, and again turning or bending it back on the other side of the bridge to its former direction and line; but the section does not touch or affect any question as to the width of the bridge or the narrowing of the road. The railway company have complied with the section, by erecting a skew bridge. The question in this case depends upon the construction of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. Now, by that act it is provided, that there shall be a clear space of thirty-five feet, if the arch be over a turnpike road, provided that where the average available width for the passage of carriages is less than the width thereinbefore prescribed, the width of the bridges need not be greater than such average available width, but so as not to be less in the case of a turnpike road than twenty feet. It is further provided, that if the average available width of the road be afterwards increased, the railway company shall increase the width of their bridge, if required, to an extent not exceeding the width of the road so widened, "or the maximum width herein, or in the special act prescribed, for a bridge in the like case over or under the railway." Much discussion took place on the argument as to the word "maximum," but the meaning of the legislature is very plain. Where the average available width for the passage of carriages on any road exceeds thirty-five feet, it may be narrowed to thirty-five feet under the arch, for the arch is only required to be of that width; where it is less, the arch may be of the same width as the road, so as it be not less than twenty feet; and if the road be afterwards widened, the arch must be proportionably widened up to, but not beyond, thirty-five feet. In the present case, the average available width of the road for the passage of carriages is the same as it was before the erection of the bridge, and the arch is of the same width, and exceeds twenty feet, and the road has not been widened, so as to call on the railway company to widen the arch. Therefore the provisions of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act appear to have been complied with. No mention is made in that act of footways, as distinguished from the road for the passage of carriages. If they are to be taken as part of the turnpike road, then the road has been narrowed from forty-three feet six inches to thirty-six feet, and the arch of the bridge is only twenty-eight feet, instead of thirty-five. We think, however, that the footpaths cannot be taken as part of the turnpike road, over which the arch of the bridge was to be thrown, within the meaning of these acts of Parliament. There is no pretence for saying that they can be taken into account in ascertaining the average available width of the road for the passage of carriages; and as that width has been preserved as it was before, in strict conformity with the acts of Parliament, it is not true to assert, as every one of the counts in this indictment does, that persons cannot pass with their carriages as they used to do. The obstruction is to foot passengers only, which is not forbidden by the acts, neither is it charged as the nuisance complained of by this indictment. The cases cited in argument are wholly inapplicable to this indictment. Judgment for the defendants.

R. v. London and Birmingham R. Co. (d).]—By the act the company were empowered to make roads over the railway, and, for that purpose, to alter the course of or raise any road. By sect. 63, when any public carriage road shall be carried over the railway, the road shall be of the clear width of fifteen feet within the fences of the bridge; by sect. 67, where any part of any carriage or horse road shall be cut through, raised, sunk or taken, the company shall cause another good and sufficient road to be made instead thereof, as convenient for passengers and carriages as the former. The company diverted a highway, and erected a bridge to carry it over the railway. The original road was forty feet wide, and the substituted one only twenty-seven, less convenient for driving sheep and cattle. The span of the bridge was thirty-three feet, but it was continued with wing walls and parapets to the distance of 168 feet, and the width of the road on the bridge and between the parapets was only sixteen feet.

Lord Denman, C. Held by the Court of Queen's Bench, that the company were bound to make the approaches as wide as the turnpike road had been. And held no sufficient return, that the approaches, though of a less width, were as convenient to the public as they could be made in execution of the powers of the act, and as convenient to the public as the original road had been; or that the company could not now widen the approaches without taking and purchasing more land; that their compulsory powers of purchasing under the act had expired before they were called upon to widen; and that they had not then, nor have since had, the power to take or purchase land for such purpose (f). In the judgment the following remarks were made on Attorney-General v. London and Southampton R. Co. (ante, p. 396). "In that case, it is true that his Honor does intimate incidentally such an opinion as has been attributed to him; the question before him then being, whether he should declare by his order a certain archwork of the said company to be a nuisance, and prohibit them from further prosecuting their works, because they were about to abridge the width of a public highway. The point, however, which now comes before us seems to have been very slightly touched in the argument, and was wholly unnecessary for the decision of the Vice-Chancellor, which was, that, provided the said arch be 'not less' than the width prescribed by the act of Parliament, he did not feel himself justified in making the order desired. The Vice-Chancellor also gives as a further reason, that many other methods were open to raise the question (alluding specially to an indictment for a nuisance) without his interference. We cannot, therefore, consider this to have been the deliberate judgment of the Vice-Chancellor upon this subject."

Attorney-General v. London and Southampton R. Co. Shadwell, V.-C., decided, that the expression "present inclination" is to be referred to the inclination of a road at the time when taken by the company; that the exception applies as well to a bridge built on a new or diverted road made by the company, as to a bridge built on the site of a previously existing turnpike road; that the relative steepness of a new or diverted road and of an old road, is to be determined, not by their comparative acclivity, measuring the whole length of each from the commencement to the end of the deviation, but by a comparison of the rate of ascent on the new road, from the place of diversion below the bridge to the crown of the arch of such bridge, with the rate of ascent on the old road from the same place to the point on the old road at which, if the two roads had been parallel, the same distance would be attained.

of the arch must be of a height from the surface of the road of not less than sixteen feet. By sect. 120, nothing is to derogate from any of the rights or privileges of any parish over which the railway shall pass, acting under any local act. A local paving act enacted, "That no person shall alter the form of any pavements which shall be now made by virtue of this act without the consent of the commissioners, or in anywise encroach thereon, or put up any posts," &c. A mandamus having issued, a return was made, and the question was, whether the railway company were authorized to lower the pavement of a street for the purpose of giving sufficient headway to a bridge.

Coleridge, J.—The commissioners do not dispute the right to carry the railway on the arch, but they deny the right to alter the pavement. If the question stood on the two clauses alone, there could be no doubt. The 9th in express terms contemplates the lowering of the roads; and the 100th, when it limits the steepness of descent under an arch, clearly looks to an alteration of level to be produced by the railway works. But it is said that the powers of the 9th section are expressly given, subject to the provisions and restrictions of the act, and that one of the provisions included is to be found in the 120th section, which provides that "nothing in the act shall extend to prejudice any of the rights or privileges of any parish over which the railway shall pass, acting under any local act." The parish is said to be within these words, because the paving, &c., are by a local act placed under the control of commissioners, in whom the pavements are vested. The same statute enacts, "that no person shall alter the form of any pavement which shall be made by virtue of this act, without consent, or in anywise encroach thereon." If this had been the whole section, it would have been very questionable whether it could have been construed so as to restrain the company from exercising powers plainly given under an act so long posterior in point of time, and which in many instances are so essential to the carrying out the purposes of their act. It would also be very questionable whether a local act, such as the one in question, comes within the meaning of the 120th section of the railway act. But the point is clear when the whole section is looked at. After the words already cited, these immediately follow: "or put up any step, or erect any bulks, or place out any show-glasses, or make any dungholes or sawpit, or other matters, so as to be an encroachment, upon pain of forfeiting 5*l.*" It is clear that this section was inserted merely as a police regulation, to prevent what are commonly called street nuisances and encroachments; and the words "form of the pavement" are well suited for such a purpose. To lower the street and relay the pavement in the same form and of the same dimensions, but on a different level, is scarcely to alter the form of the pavement. Their counsel also relied on a section in the same act, which vests the property of the pavements in the commissioners; but this appears to us immaterial. Judgment for defendants.

R. v. Sharpe (i).]—A company were empowered "to divert or alter any roads, in order the more conveniently to carry the same over or under the railway." The company, in carrying a road under the railway, had erected a skew bridge, which diverted the road to an angle of 45°, instead of 34°, which was the angle made at that particular point by the old line of road. At the trial of an indictment against the company's engineer, Alderson, B. (having consulted Parke, B. (j)), directed the

(j) Parke, B., said that, in a case which had been tried before him as to the power which a company had to make a railway over a public highway, he laid it down that "if possible, the work must be constructed without any inconvenience to the public; but if it could not be done without some such inconvenience, it must be done with the least possible, according to the provisions mentioned in the act." This was R. v. London and Southampton R. Co., tried at jury, that, as the only way for the company to resist the charge was, to show that the bridge complained of had been built in conformity with the act of Parliament, the question in substance was, what was the most proper way to construe it. The word "conveniently" meant more conveniently upon the whole for carrying into effect the purposes of the act; and, if the work was done in a mode in which an experienced engineer would construct it, having reasonable regard to the interests both of the company and the public in the construction of it, it was to be looked upon as being in conformity with the intention of the act; that it was, therefore, for the jury to say, whether there was any practical inconvenience arising to the public, by the road being diverted more obliquely than before. If the public would sustain such inconvenience, then, as it was clear that the bridge could be so made, and no inconvenience was added to the public by its not being so made, the verdict should be for the Crown; but, if they thought that no material practical inconvenience was sustained by the public, in having the present bridge instead of the other of 34°, as it would be across the original road, and that an experienced engineer would have so constructed it, having regard to the interests both of the public and the company, they had a right to make such a diversion in building the bridge. The jury found a verdict for defendant; and the Queen's Bench refused a new trial.

Where a special act required a company to strengthen an old bridge described in the act:—Held, that they might nevertheless pull down the old bridge under their statutory powers, and build a new one.

Where an umpire directed a road to be carried in a particular direction, and the company afterwards made the road, but deviated from the line laid down:—Held, that it was only a subject for compensation, if the road was less convenient.

Wood v. North Stafford R. Co.

Wood v. North Stafford R. Co. (k).—Motion to discharge an injunction. Plaintiffs were owners in fee of large cotton mills and a brewery, and premises, in Macclesfield, immediately adjoining S. Bridge, and close to the turnpike road from Langley across S. Bridge to M. When defendants' bill was before Parliament, plaintiff opposed it in committee, and an agreement was afterwards entered into and the opposition withdrawn. By the agreement, the compensation to be paid to plaintiffs, and other matters, were to be settled by arbitration. Amongst other things, the arbitrators were to be at liberty to take into consideration loss of trade and interruption to business, and to award a sum for new buildings; and to be invested with all powers contained in the Lands Clauses Act, as if the sale had taken place under the compulsory powers of the company's acts. And by the sixth clause, "The arbitrators, in fixing such price, shall at the same time decide upon suitable approaches to be made by the company, to the whole of the premises of the plaintiffs, including the brewery, by a good road on arches from or near S. Bridge to the yard, for the purpose of business."

The award was subsequently made and damages given, and the umpire also directed that the company should make a good road on arches, from or near S. Bridge, to plaintiffs' factory yard, in the line shown on the plan annexed, such road to be seven yards wide, to be made according to the sections shown on the plan. The lines thus indicated carried the approach to plaintiffs' premises into the road leading over S. Bridge into M.

When the award was made, the company did not contemplate altering the site of S. Bridge; but afterwards it appeared more expedient to pull down the bridge, and erect another bridge; and it then became necessary to divert the turnpike road which led to S. Bridge, and, consequently, to depart from the line marked out for the approach to plaintiffs' premises, by the umpire, and thus to add fourteen yards to the distance, between plaintiffs' premises and M.

The injunction had been obtained on the allegation that the substituted road would be very inconvenient to plaintiffs, and would materially injure their premises.

the Hants Summer Assizes, 1838, in which his lordship held, that mere expense was no reason for not making a road over the cutting as convenient as before.

 (k) 1 Macn. & G. 278.

Lord Cottenham, C., said—No doubt, when this award was made, the deviation in question was not contemplated by either party. By the 14th section of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, and independently of the agreement, this company has (as all other railway companies have) the power of deviating within certain limits; and, so far as those limits are concerned, it is admitted that the deviation complained of is within the boundary which the act of Parliament has authorized. It is said, however, that by the 30th section of the special act (l), the existence of S. Bridge is contemplated. Now the 16th section of the general act, authorizing the construction of bridges and other works, is incorporated into the special act; and the 30th section of the latter must, therefore, be construed in connection with the provisions of the general act; and I am of opinion, that, so far from interfering, the 16th section is quite consistent with it. The only object contemplated by the 30th section was the security of the old bridge, which, if the railroad was to pass, as it was laid down in the plans, would require additional props, to sustain the greater quantity of earth to be placed upon it. Then with reference to the contract, the plaintiffs contend that it was agreed, that certain communications to their works should be preserved to them, or substituted for those they had previously enjoyed. (His lordship, after observing that it was no doubt intended that a communication should be preserved, the only point being, whether a deviation having become expedient, and the communication to the plaintiffs' premises being still preserved, though not in the precise line indicated by the award, the company had complied with the award, proceeded as follows:)—There is no allegation that the company has not made the road near to S. Bridge in accordance with the letter of the contract, but only that the plaintiffs have not the same use of the high road into M., as contemplated by the award. I am, however, of opinion that there is a performance, not only in spirit, but according to the letter of the award; and if the substituted road is not so convenient a mode of communicating with the plaintiffs' premises into the town, as the one awarded, that is an injury not provided for by the contract, but is a case which expressly comes under the 16th section of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, whereby all damage to roads, &c., is the subject of compensation. The injunction must, therefore, be dissolved.

that, as plaintiffs' object must be to procure for the public using the road, a compliance with sect. 72, upon the company entering into an undertaking to complete a bridge over the road with all possible despatch, an injunction ought not to be granted (m).

VII.—Cases relating to the Diversion, &c. of Roads.

If a railway company stop up an old road without substituting a new one, in pursuance of the provisions of a special act, they are liable to be indicted for a nuisance.

R. v. Scott.

R. v. Scott (n).]—By an act, a company were empowered (sect. 94) to divert or alter any roads in order to carry the same over or under or by the side of the railway. By sect. 97, in all cases wherein any part of any carriage road, &c. should be cut through, raised, sunk, taken, or so much injured as to be impassable or inconvenient for passengers or carriages, &c., the company should, at their own expense, before any such road, &c. should be cut through, cause a good and sufficient carriage road, &c. to be set out and made instead thereof, as convenient for passengers and carriages as the former road, or as near thereto as might be. The company had diverted a highway, and obstructed the old road by building a wall across it, and had made a new road, which was neither as convenient to the public as the old one, nor as near thereto as might be. Held, that the company were liable to be indicted in the common form for so obstructing the highway.

The company stopped up the public highway mentioned in the indictment, called G. lane, and made a branch, restoring the communication between the termini formerly connected by that lane, but by a different line. The new road was in some respects more convenient to the public than the old, but in others less so. The levels of the adjacent land made it impracticable to give a more convenient line consistently with the regulations of the act, unless at an expense which would be unreasonably great, and quite disproportioned to the benefit which would accrue from it to the public. Maule, J., directed the jury to find a verdict of not guilty, if they thought that the company had done no more damage than was necessary, and had made the road as convenient as the former one, or as nearly so as might be; intimating, as his own opinion, that the road made by the company could not be deemed absolutely as convenient, even after allowing for the advantages which the public might have gained from it. But he stated, that the company were not bound to lay out enormous sums of money to procure a slight accommodation to some persons; and that the proper rule seemed to be, that if they could not make the road as convenient as before, without a very disproportionate and unwarrantable expenditure, they should make it as nearly so as they could; and he left it to them to say whether the new road was as convenient as before, or if not, as nearly so as it might be. The jury found a verdict of guilty on two counts (including that first mentioned), and not guilty on the others. On a rule for a new trial,

Lord Denman, C. J., said, the defendants proved that the obstruction was caused by the exercise of certain powers conferred by their act of incorporation. The prosecutors, who are the surveyors of the highways, crave our judgment. The work complained of as a nuisance, and undoubtedly making one, is the cutting through of the carriage road. Now, there is no question as to their right to do this: and though they are required, when they do it, to cause another road to be set out and made instead of it, they argue that they are no longer indictable for a nuisance in doing the lawful act, however they may for disobedience of the law, in neglecting to substitute another. The prosecutors reply by referring to the section (97), which requires the company to cause a new road to be made before they cut through the old. But the company rejoin, that, from the state of the earth there, it was impossible to do this, and could not be intended by the legislature. This argument we think inadmissible, for reasons too obvious to require a full statement of them. The company have done what the act legalises only on a condition which they have not performed. They stand convicted of the nuisance, and show no justification. The verdict will, therefore, not be disturbed; but we still hope that the parties may consent to an arrangement useful to the public (o).

Diversion of Roads.

R. v. Scott.

Attorney-General v. London and South-Western R. Co. (p).—Motion for injunction. Defendants were constructing their railway, which crossed the turnpike road, in a slight cutting of about one foot six inches; and had begun to carry the road over the railway by means of a deviation and bridge; and at the place where the proposed railway was to cross the road, and for a very considerable distance on each side thereof, the road led across a flat and in a straight line; and there was no necessity, for the purpose of passing over the railway, that the road should be diverted from the straight line, and any such diversion would occasion considerable inconvenience to the public; but the company intended to divert the road from the straight line, carrying it from the then present line of road on the north side of the railway, by a sharp curve up to the bridge, and, having crossed the bridge, to return into the then present line of road again, by another sharp curve. The engineers and surveyors, on behalf of the information, deposed, that, at a comparatively trifling extra cost, the company could have carried the road over the railway, by a bridge in its present line, by raising the road as it approached the bridge, for some distance on either side; and that this was the only plan whereby the road could be made as nearly convenient as the circumstances allowed, within the meaning of the Railways Clauses Act (sect 56).

Injunction issued against a company for not making a road equally convenient as a former road under sect. 56.

Attorney-General v. London and South Western R. Co.

In a negotiation between the trustees of the road and the company, the former proposed, that, to lessen the curve, the company should add a pier at each side of the bridge (which was then already erected) nearest the road, and purchase some of the land, which was common land, adjoining the road at each end of the bridge, still further to lessen the curve at the junction with the old road. The company refused to comply with this suggestion, but offered to refer the question to the Board of Trade. This offer was declined, and the information was filed at the relation of the trustees.

Sir Knight Bruce, V. C.—The question is, whether in their proposed works the company are doing as little damage as may be, or whether it can be said that the road intended to be substituted for the road taken away is, in the language of the 56th section, “equally convenient as” the former road, or as near thereto as circumstances will allow.

The impression made by the evidence upon my mind is, that the company are not doing as little damage as may be; and that the road which they propose to substitute is not as “convenient as” the former road, or as near thereto as circumstances allow. They are intending that which, in my view of the facts and of the law, is a wrong; and it is a wrong of a nature, which I understand it to be the office of this court to restrain.

(o) This decision does not seem to apply to cases falling within the provisions of the Consolidation Act. Patteson, J., says, in delivering a judgment under the latter act, “The distinction between this case and R. v. Scott is very obvious. That case was decided before the passing of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, and rests entirely upon the provisions of the special act, which contained no remedy for the act complained of, and therefore the common law remedy remained; but here the question is one of construction upon quite a different act.” Watkins v. Great Northern R. Co., 20 L. J. (Q. B.) 391; 16 Q. B. 961; and see ante, 207.

(p) 3 De G. & S. 439.

Cases.Diversion of Roads.

*Attorney-General
v. London and South-Western
R. Co.*

It has been said, and perhaps justly, that all the court can correctly decide, upon this motion, is, that what the company are doing is what the court thinks not right, whilst the court cannot point out to the company what they ought to do. I do not see how that is to be avoided, except by stating the reasons which induce the court to come to its conclusion, or the manner in which it appears to the court, that that which seems an evil can be remedied.

Now, the grounds upon which I proceed are, that the avowed plan of the company makes a curve, or rather curves, upon the substituted road, inconveniently and unnecessarily sudden; that this suddenness might be removed, and the curve or curves made easier, without any unreasonable or heavy expense, and without any extraordinary difficulty.

There appears to me two ways of avoiding the inconvenience,—either to increase the width of the surface at the ends of the approaches of the bridges, in the manner suggested, with other works of a slight description accompanying it, which, according to my present opinion, subject to anything that the relator's counsel may say, I consider the company not bound to provide; or if the company do not think fit to adopt that course, they may, I apprehend, by lengthening the new portions of the road, and by acquiring more land for the purpose from the common, make the curve sufficiently easy, and sufficiently convenient for the public, without altering or adding to the bridge. Because I think that that which is required for the public convenience may be effected in one of these ways, I am of opinion that the present injunction ought to be granted, without prejudice to any application which either party may make to the Railway Commissioners.

1. What is a sufficient substituted road.
2. A memorandum on the plans and sections that a road is to be stopped and another road used in lieu thereof, does not amount to a licence to the company to stop the road.
3. Where an injunction was disobeyed and a sequestration ordered.

*Attorney-General
v. Great Northern
R. Co.*

Attorney-General v. Great Northern R. Co. (q).—Information for obstructing a public highway. The bill stated that the company were interfering with a public road, by digging a trench and lowering the level of it, and causing a permanent and complete obstruction thereof; and prayed for an injunction restraining them from obstructing the road, or rendering the same less convenient for the passage of carriages, &c., than it had previously been, until they had made a proper substituted road.

Upon the plans and sections deposited with the clerk of the peace, in pursuance of Standing Orders, and referred to by the special act, Crab Lane (the road which was stopped) was coloured blue; another lane, called Rose Lane, was coloured green; and the following note was inserted upon the plan: "Note—Road to be stopped, coloured blue; road to be used in lieu thereof, coloured green." Conflicting affidavits were made as to whether Rose Lane was an adequate substitute for the obstructed road, and also as to other facts.

Knight Bruce, V. C.—Upon the dispute in this case, so far as any legal point is involved, either party is entitled to take the judgment of a court of law; the only question before me is, what ought to be done in the meantime.

Now, on the words on the plans and sections, I am of opinion that nothing material for any present purpose arises.—They seem to me not to confer a right which, without them, would not have existed; and I think also, that they do not give that kind or degree of notice which would be sufficient, on the ground of laches or acquiescence, to impede the action of the court between the contending parties.

Then comes the question of the right permanently to stop this road without any substitution. So far as I can with propriety, in the present stage of the cause, give an opinion upon the law, I think that a right to stop this road permanently, with or without a substitution, has not been shown to exist.

The question then arises, whether the existing road, called Rose Lane, can be treated as a substituted road for the present purpose, during the temporary stoppage of Crab Lane; and I think that it would be a most perverted construction of the act to say that the existing road ought to be so treated. The plaintiff is, therefore, entitled to an injunction to secure to him the passage, either along this road or along a substituted road, not being Rose Lane, while these works are going on, or until the opinion of a court of law can be obtained. The order may be agreed on between the parties. It cannot be necessary to put the company to any useless inconvenience, nor can an injunction be proper which should command an impossibility.

After this injunction had been granted, the company removed the embankment, and proceeded to form their line of railway across Crab Lane on a level. They erected two posts on each side of their railway, and fences extending from the posts towards the sides of the road. The defendants hung gates on the posts. They also opened their line of railway for public traffic, and the gates were kept shut when trains were expected to pass on the railway crossing the highway.

Upon these new facts a motion was made for a sequestration, for a breach of the injunction by erecting the posts, and fences and gates across the highway, and by crossing the lane on a level. And it was insisted that, besides being a breach of the injunction, this proceeding was contrary to 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, particularly sections 46 and 53. It appeared that the company had not obtained the consent of the justices in petty sessions, authorizing them to cross the highway at a level, under sect. 56, and the Board of Trade had not given a certificate, enabling the company to modify the construction of the road under sect. 66.

Knight Bruce, V. C.—When the injunction was granted the rails were, as I understand the facts, used only for purposes connected with the construction of the railway, and not for the conveyance of passengers or goods; not for what, in the language of the business, is called traffic. But the railway having been opened for public use, it is clear that obstruction and impediment to the free use of the turnpike road are thus caused to a greater extent than was the case at the time of granting the injunction, and, in a sense, differently; and this, independently of the gates. But the gates, however necessary or valuable they may be, for the purpose of protecting life, do, as it appears to me in the sense in which plainly the words “obstructed,” “impeded,” and “hindered,” are used in the injunction, obstruct the turnpike road—do create such an impediment and hindrance as the injunction has plainly forbidden.

I assume that the Railway Commissioners have sanctioned the opening of the railway for public use, and that they did so upon condition that the defendants should erect the gates. But if the commissioners could, by any order or act of theirs, have rendered the defendants’ present use of the turnpike road, or mode of dealing with it, lawful against the right or interests which it is the object of this suit to protect, they have not been proved to me to have done so, or to have professed or intended to do so. My impression is, that the case before me is not in the least degree affected by anything that they appear to have done.

Then comes the question what, if anything, the court ought to do in consequence; for it does not necessarily follow that the process asked must issue. It was upon the defendants, however, to make a case to exempt them from it; and perhaps if they had shown their proceedings not to be plainly and clearly illegal, I mean illegal independently of any question of contempt, or had satisfied the court that the injunction ought not to have been granted at all, or ought to be dissolved, discharged, or put into a shape more favourable to the defendants than it is, or had stated that they had appealed from it, or from the order granting it, or intended to do so, I might have declined or delayed to direct process to go. But none of these things have they done. On the contrary, my belief is strengthened of the utter impropriety (without any reference to the injunction or this suit) of the acts alleged to be also a contempt of the court; my opinion is more fixed, that the injunction, if it goes far enough, does not go too far against the defendants, and is one of which they cannot justly complain. Considering, then, their conduct to be at once contumacious and otherwise illegal, to be wrongful against the plaintiff individually, wrongful against the Queen's subjects at large, and of—I had almost said—scandalous example, whatever amount of inconvenience may be the consequence of acting against the defendants on this occasion, I think it right to deal with them according to their merits. The consequence may possibly be to stop the railway; I answer again, that it ought to be stopped, for it passes, where it does, by wrong.

The directors of the company and their agents cannot, on this motion, at present be committed to prison. But what can be, shall be done, to repress a daring invasion of private and public rights, maintained in open defiance of law, authority and order. Let a sequestration issue.

Upon appeal to the Lord Chancellor, the company undertook to carry the road, called Crab Lane, over the railway, and in the mean time to provide a convenient substituted road, in the manner directed by the Railways Clauses Act; and on payment of costs all further proceedings were stayed.

Any special stipulations as to the mode of constructing works should be embodied in the railway act, or be made the subject of an agreement between the parties.

Aldred v. North Midland R. Co.

Aldred v. North Midland R. Co. (r).]—The trustees of a turnpike road agreed to assent to a bill in Parliament, on condition that the railway should pass over the road at a sufficient elevation, and that the road should not be lowered or otherwise prejudiced. This qualified assent was given in both Houses of Parliament, and the bill passed. Sect. 12 of the act, among other powers, authorized the company to raise and sink roads or ways, in order the more conveniently to carry the same over or under or by the side of the railway. Sect. 72 enacted, that the arch of any bridge, for carrying the railway across any turnpike road, should be of a height, from the surface of such road to the centre of such arch, of not less than sixteen feet, provided that the descent under any such bridge should not exceed one foot in thirty feet. The act contained no particular proviso as to the road in question.

It was decided by Shadwell, V. C., that the modified assent of the road trustees—the terms of which were neither embodied in any agreement between the trustees and the company, nor adopted by the legislature—afforded no equitable ground for restraining the company from enforcing, with regard to the road in question, all the powers conferred by the act; and that the company were authorized to sink the original surface of a turnpike road, in order to give the specified elevation to the arch of a bridge erected for carrying the railway over such road, notwithstanding that the effect, from the peculiar situation of the road, would be to render it liable to be occasionally flooded.

An agreement made before an act is passed to construct a road in a specified manner, is binding on a railway company.

Edwards v. Grand Junction R. Co.

Edwards v. Grand Junction R. Co. (s).]—A company had projected a railway to cross a certain turnpike road. The trustees of the road had taken measures for opposing the bill, unless certain clauses restricting, with regard to such road, the general powers proposed to be granted in the bill, were introduced. The company, by their agent, entered into an agreement with the trustees, to the effect, that, instead of such clauses being inserted in the act, they should be embodied in an agreement between the company and the trustees. One of the terms of such agreement was, that the trustees should not oppose the bill; and they accordingly made no opposition to it, and the act passed without the restrictive clauses. It was decided by Shadwell, V. C., and also by the L. C., that the incorporated company could not exercise a power conferred by the act, in violation of the terms of the agreement. [And see ante, p. 151.]

Cases.
Diversion of Roads.

Breynton v. L. and N. W. R. Co. (t).—An injunction had been obtained to prevent defendants from lowering a turnpike road, so as to make it pass under the railway, instead of crossing it on a level. By the special act, the company were authorized to construct the railway across and on the level of the turnpike road in question; and it appeared that, according to the plans deposited, the company proposed to take part of plaintiff's lands adjoining the turnpike road, and the plan showed that the railway was to pass over plaintiff's lands, on an embankment above the level of the land and road, and that it was intended to raise the road, so as to pass the railroad on a level.

Under these circumstances, the company, by an agreement, purchased plaintiff's lands, and the agreement recited that the company were desirous of making the purchase for the purpose of constructing the railroad "according to a certain plan and section thereof deposited." On motion to dissolve this injunction,

Lord Langdale, M. R., said—Two distinct questions arise. The first as to the power conferred by the acts of Parliament, and the second as to the obligations which the company have entered into with the plaintiff.

It is the duty of the court to take care, on the one hand, that public companies, when interfering with the private property of individuals, do not exceed the power conferred on them by the legislature; and on the other, to see that the companies be not impeded in the due exercise of those powers which the legislature clearly intended to confer upon them.

I was very much struck with the peculiarity of this application. It was the first time that a complaint had been made that a company, possessing the power of crossing the roads of the country at a level, were desirous of not exercising it, preferring, under their powers, to make roads pass under or over the railway. No one can have attended to this subject without knowing that the public have a very great interest in preventing the common roads being crossed by a railway on a level.

The facts of this case are, that by the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, two of the powers which had formerly been inserted in the particular acts—namely, the powers of making lateral and vertical deviations—are given to the company (sections 14, 15). Powers are also given of making works of a particular kind, and especially those referred to in the 16th section, by which, subject to the provisions contained in the general act, and in the special act, power is given to do a great variety of things, including a distinct power to carry a road underneath the railway. Is there anything in this general act to the contrary? I am of opinion there is not. Is there anything to the contrary in the provisions of the special act? It is said that the clause is, which refers to the deposited plans; but, on looking at it, I am of opinion that the enacting part does not abridge that power. It provides that the line shall be observed; and, in this case, it is not proposed to alter it in any respect whatever, either by making a lateral or vertical deviation. Then what is there which constitutes a legislative provision, that this power conferred by the general act is not to have its operation? It is said, that, on the plan which was deposited, the road in question was designated as a road, which was to pass at a level, and that, by a clause in the special act, permission was given for that purpose; but I cannot conceive that the legislature intended by that clause to restrict, in any way,

An agreement recited that a company were desirous of making a purchase of lands to make a railway, "according to a plan and section deposited," and the plan showed that a railway was to cross a turnpike road at a level:—Held, that although the special act authorized the road to be so crossed on a level, the company were entitled to carry the road under the railway; and, quære, whether a company can by a private arrangement contract itself out of powers entrusted to them for the public good.

the powers given by the preceding act. The agreement which the parties entered into was to refer to arbitration the question of value, and the amount of loss and damage. It refers in the recital to the special act, and by so doing must include every portion of it; consequently those portions of the general act which are expressly incorporated in it. Looking, however, at that agreement, I am of opinion there is nothing in it which can even tend to diminish the power which the company derived under the acts of Parliament.

Though the point has not been argued, I must say I do not think it perfectly clear, that a company having a power given to it plainly for the public good, but which may effect an injury on an individual in respect of which compensation can be given, has a right to contract itself out of those powers (u). On a proper occasion these matters ought to be most carefully considered. I certainly have never felt the least disposition to extend the powers of railway companies; and I believe it would be for their own and for the public advantage if those powers were less than they seem to be; but if they have powers given them for the public benefit, such, for instance, as to make a road under, instead of across a railway, I do not feel satisfied that they have the right or power to contract themselves out of it, by a private agreement with any individual whatever.—Injunction dissolved.

If surveyors of highways object to a road which has been substituted for a former road, they are not authorized to obstruct it, but must enforce the usual legal remedies (x).

London and Brighton R. Co. v. Blake.

London and Brighton R. Co. v. Blake (y).]—The L. and B. R. Act (s. 59), after reciting that it was intended to carry the railway across certain public roads in the parish of C., and to alter the present surface of such roads, enacts that all alterations, whether temporary or permanent, of any of the said public roads, and all works connected therewith, and all bridges to be erected, and all future repairs of such altered roads, or of any temporary roads, and the quality of the materials to be used and applied, in or to such altered or temporary roads, and all future damage to such altered or temporary roads, shall be made, completed and finished under the superintendence, from time to time, and to the entire satisfaction of the board of surveyors of roads for the parish of C. By sect. 60, "If the company shall, in the doing, making, completing and finishing all, or any, or either of such alterations or works in, to, or belonging to the said public roads, do or cause any injury or damage to any of the said roads, or to any part thereof, and shall not forthwith proceed to repair and make good such injury or damage, to the satisfaction of the board of surveyors of the parish of C., or if the roads so to be altered shall not be properly made and completed and kept in repair, it shall be lawful for the said board of surveyors to cause such repairs to be done." The company made a diverted temporary road leading from one of the said roads, which diverted temporary road was crossed by the railway. The railway did not cross the old road, neither did the company alter the level or surface of the old road. The company also made and tendered to the surveyors a permanent diverted road, which the surveyors refused to approve of or accept. The company having, in the execution of their works, crossed the temporary diverted road with locomotive engines, the surveyors put up fences on either side, so as to obstruct the passage across it:—Held, by Shadwell, V. C., that, even if the surveyors had, under sects. 59 and 60, jurisdiction to determine in what manner the diverted permanent road should be made, they were not justified in putting up the fences across the temporary road, but ought to have applied to equity for an injunction, or to a court of law for a mandamus; and that the right of the surveyors was a private right, the surveyors being in no way interested in the question of public safety.

VIII. Cases relating to the Repairs of Works.

R. v. Inhabitants of Kent (z).]—The Medway Navigation Company, being empowered under a local act (16 & 17 Car. 2) to make the river navigable, and to take tolls, and “to amend or alter such bridges or highways as might hinder the passage or navigation, leaving them or others as convenient in their room,” &c., and having forty years ago destroyed a ford across the river in the common highway, by deepening its bed, and built a bridge over the same place, it was decided that they were bound to keep such bridge in repair.

A company under an act of Parliament destroyed a ford, and substituted a bridge: Held, that they were liable to keep the bridge in repair.

R. v. Kent.

Lord Ellenborough, C. J., said, “Here the statute gives power to the company to take or alter the old highway for their own purposes, upon condition of leaving another passage as convenient in its room; and if they do not perform the condition, they are not entitled to do the act. It is a continuing condition; and when the company thought proper, for their own benefit, to alter the highway in the bed of the river, so that the public could no longer have the same benefit of the ford, they were bound to give another passage over the bridge, and to keep it for the public.”—Le Blanc and Bayley, Js., concurred.

R. v. Kerrison (a).]—Where certain persons and their successors were authorized by Parliament to make a river navigable, and to cut the soil of any persons for making any new channel, &c., by virtue of which they cut through a highway, and rendered it impassable, and a bridge was built over the cut, over which the public passed, and which had been repaired by the proprietors of the navigation, it was decided that the proprietors, and not the county, were liable to repair the bridge. Lord Ellenborough, C. J., said—“The undertakers of this navigation have a duty arising out of the execution of their own powers under the act. The act enables them to cut new channels as occasion should require; and, if occasion requires them to cut through a public highway, their duty is to furnish a substitute to the public, by means of a bridge. Can we put any other construction upon the act but this—that the legislature intended that, so far as regarded the making the river navigable, and the cutting new channels for that purpose, neither public nor private rights should stand in their way? But still they should make good to the public in another shape the means of passage over such ways as they were empowered to cut through. What has been done is not a mere incommoding the passage, leaving the public a partial enjoyment of the highway, but it is a total deprivation of the means of using it. I am not aware that what we now decide will at all clash with what we decided in R. v. Inhabitants of Kent.” (Supra.) Le Blanc and Bayley, Js., concurred.

struct all or any of the sewers at the mouths thereof, so and in such manner that the sewers might be discharged considerably under the surface of the water in the floating harbour, and also to make such other alterations in the sewers of the city, as might or should be necessary in consequence of the floating of the said harbour." The directors altered several of the sewers, so as to discharge them considerably under the surface of the water in the floating harbour; but the sewage there discharged was so offensive as to be a nuisance to the neighbourhood. It was decided that, under the latter part of the above clause, the directors were authorized and required to make a new sewer, if necessary, to remove the nuisance.

So where a company of adventurers cut an artificial drain which intersected a highway, and a bridge was erected by the company and used by the public, it was held that the company were bound to keep the bridge in repair.

R. v. Inhabitants of Ely.

R. v. Inhabitants of Ely (c).]—Indictment for non-repair of a bridge by a division of a county:—Plea, that certain adventurers had, under the authority of a commission of sewers, cut an artificial drain which intersected and obstructed an immemorial highway, and that they had erected the bridge over the drain in the line of the former highway, and not upon the ancient course of any river, and that the former highway had been thenceforth carried over the bridge; that after the making the bridge, the drain and the bridge and large quantities of land, for the purpose of draining which the said drain was made, were vested by act of Parliament in the corporation of the Bedford Level, in trust for the adventurers, with power to the corporation to levy money for maintaining the works; and that the drain was useful to the adventurers and to the corporation, and had been always maintained and repaired by them for their benefit: that the corporation was liable, and of right ought to repair the said bridge. The Court of Queen's Bench decided, that as the interruption of the highway by the adventurers was done for their own benefit, it could be legal only, on the condition of substituting another highway, by a bridge as convenient for the public as the old one; that this condition was a continuing one, and that the plea afforded a good answer to the indictment.

Patteson, J., said—The general rule may be considered to have been established with regard to bridges built before 43 Geo. 3, c. 59, at least from the time of R. v. West Riding of Yorkshire (d), in the words of Ashurst, J., "that if a man builds a bridge, and it becomes useful to the county in general, the county shall repair it." In a case by the same name, in 2 East, 342, this rule was held to apply to the case of a bridge first built by the trustees of a turnpike road, where no bridge had been before, over a natural rivulet; the bridge was of public utility, and Lord Ellenborough assumed that the trustees had authority to build it, and they had power to levy tolls for the repair of the road; but there were no funds specifically provided for the repair of the bridge, and the trustees were not personally liable. Where, however, a navigation company were authorized to take or alter the old highway for their own purposes, only upon condition of leaving another as good in its room, and the company deepening a ford which had been the highway, so as to render it impassable, had made a bridge necessary, and accordingly built it, this court held the condition to be a continuing one; that the company were bound permanently to keep the highway as good for the public, and so to keep the bridge, which was the substituted highway, in repair, R. v. Kent (e). And although there are some slight differences between the facts of this case and those of R. v. Lindsey (f), yet the principle of decision was substantially the same, and the latter may be considered a full confirmation of the former decision.

After commenting on these cases, his lordship said—It would be safer, therefore, perhaps not to rely on these cases further than as a general affirmance of the general rule. But in R. v. Kerrison (g), where a navigation company made a navigable cut across a highway, rendering it impassable, the court held that the owner of the navigation was liable to the repair, though no tolls were paid in respect of passing the bridge, and no funds for its maintenance were distinctly found to exist. And they proceeded on the same principle which had decided the cases in the 13th and 14th East; and that principle seems to be this—undoubtedly a just one—that where the act making the bridge necessary, though authorized to be done, interferes with the public right, is done primarily for private purposes, and the public user, from which the public benefit is inferred, is to be referred only to the act, because made necessary by it (the public, indeed, remaining only with the same convenience which it had before), the authority to do the act is conditional only, equally whether the condition be expressed or implied; and the condition also is in both cases continuing, so long as the act continues whereby the public right is interfered with; and as the obligation here insisted on arises from the parties' own act, which would be unlawful unless such obligation were complied with, the case steers clear of any consideration as to the existence of funds; for the party bringing the duty upon himself for his own purposes, cannot object the want of funds for the performance of it.

It appears to us, that when the adventurers first cut the drain and interrupted the public highway, that act, however authorized by commissioners of sewers, or the powers vested in them, was done for their own use, benefit and convenience, and could be legal only on the condition of substituting another highway, which could be only by a bridge as convenient for the public as the old one; that the public were in truth no gainers by the change; they were by the hypothesis merely placed in the same situation as before; and that the condition which was necessary to legalize the first cutting of the drain, was and is a continuing one; the instant it is broken, the indefeasible rights of the public revive, and the cut becomes a nuisance. We think, therefore, that the plea is in substance good, and that the facts it discloses clearly distinguish it from R. v. Oxfordshire (h), where the bridge was built by trustees of a turnpike road, for public purposes only.

There is another fact in this case which does not appear distinctly found in any of the decided cases, namely, that the cut, the banks, and the bridge, are all expressly vested in the corporation by statute; and this is relied on by the counsel for the Crown as making the plea double. But we think it is not set up, nor could be, as alone of power to throw the liability on the corporation, and therefore that it does not open the plea to the objection of duplicity. At the same time we by no means say that it is an unimportant fact, in addition to the others on which we mainly rely.

Priestley v. Foulds (i).]—An incorporated company were authorized by Parliament to make a navigable canal, the construction of which would interfere with an ancient drain. By the statute the company were required to make a drain on each side of the canal, and parallel therewith, in lieu of part of the ancient drain, which would be destroyed. By another section they were required to make such arches, tunnels, culverts, drains or other passages over, under, by the side of, or into the canal, and the trenches, streams and watercourses communicating therewith, and towing-paths on the sides thereof, of such depth, breadth, and dimensions as should be sufficient to convey the water clear from the lands adjoining the canal, without obstructing or impounding the same; and to support, maintain, cleanse and keep in repair all such arches, &c., drains and other passages. It was decided that the drains made in pursuance of the former section, in lieu of the ancient drain, were to be cleansed by the company, as well as those made in pursuance of the latter section; and that a summary remedy given by the latter section, in case of non-repair by the company, was applicable to a default in cleansing the drains made in lieu of the ancient drains.—Tindal, C. J., “In R. v. Kent (ante, p. 411), it was held, that a clause directing the erection of a bridge imposed a continuing obligation. That case appears to me to furnish a key to unlock the meaning of this act of Parliament. There the power of building a bridge in lieu of a ford, which the company were authorized to destroy,—here the power of substituting new drains for the old Fleet drain,—were conferred by the legislature for the particular benefit of the respective companies. This case, therefore, falls within the well-known maxim ‘qui sentit commodum sentire debet et onus.’”—Bosanquet, Coltman and Maule, Js., concurred.

Liability of navigation company to repair banks of a channel.

R. v. Bristol Dock Co.

R. v. Bristol Dock Co. (k).—By a dock act certain persons were formed into a company for improving a port, and made proprietors of the works, and were authorized and required to make, complete and maintain a new course or channel for a river, the same to be of equal depth and breadth at the bottom, and with equal inclination of the sides, as the then present river course then had, in those parts thereof which had not been excavated or embanked, or as near as circumstances would admit, except in such parts of the new course as should be cut through rock or stone. A mandamus issued, stating that the company had made and completed a new channel, but that certain parts of the bank, not cut through rock or stone, had since become and were broken down and out of repair, and the inclination of the said side was thereby greatly altered, to the danger of the obstruction of the navigation and damage of all the liege subjects, &c.; and the company were commanded to repair and maintain the said parts of the bank. Return—that the company were not required by the statute nor otherwise liable to repair and maintain the said parts; and that, as near as circumstances had admitted or did admit, they had maintained the new course of equal depth and breadth at the bottom, and with equal inclination of the sides as the river course at the time of the act passing had in those parts which had not been excavated or embanked, and except such parts of the new course as had been cut through rock or stone. It was decided that the first part of the return was bad, as traversing matter of law, and also because a legal liability appeared; that the second part was also bad, as not answering the mandatory part of the writ, but applying only to matter stated in the writ, as a consequence of the omission to repair.

plaintiff's lands by an overflow of water, caused through the negligent execution of certain works charged to have been done by defendants. It appeared that a resolution had been passed by the commissioners, directing their engineer to prepare a specification for certain works which they wished to have executed, and tenders were sent in; and at a meeting of the commissioners they accepted the tender sent in by one Button. The contract contained a clause, "that all parts of the work to be done by Button, as were not in a particular manner specified and described in the contract or plans and specifications, shall be executed in such manner as the surveyor of the said works for the time being shall direct, and in a good and workmanlike manner," under certain penalties. Button did the work under the contract, including the removal of a bank, which was specified in it, which bank he re-erected of insufficient materials, and afterwards let the water in prematurely, which sunk the bank and went over it into the plaintiff's orchard. It was no part of the contract that he should let in the water.

It was contended that the contractor was not the servant of the commissioners, so as to make them liable for the consequences of his negligent execution of the works. The jury found a verdict for plaintiff; and a rule having been obtained to set it aside,

Lord Denman, C. J., now delivered judgment—"The grievance was the overflowing of the plaintiff's orchard by drains imperfectly made. A bank, placed at first too close to an extensive excavation, had been moved backward, but was re-erected of insufficient materials; water was prematurely admitted, which sunk the bank, and went over it into the plaintiff's land. If a proper cess had been made, the evidence was, that the water might have passed away without injury to the plaintiff. All this was done by the contractor; and the defendant contended, that it was not in execution of the works contracted for. I directed the jury that the commissioners could not be liable, unless the damage was done in execution of the contract, stating my opinion that there would be a want of skill or care in being taken by surprise by a bad vein of soil, and not making the bank sufficiently strong to resist the water; but that if the improper introduction by Button of the water had caused the injury, that was not done by their authority, and that they were not liable in this action. The jury found for the plaintiff, and we think properly, on that point. It now seems to us that, if the bank was in itself insufficient and unskilfully constructed, the maker of it is liable for the damage done, though that may have been directly caused by something wrong proceeding from another; and hence, that if the commissioners constructed a weak and dangerous bank, they would be liable for the damage done by water improperly let in, whether by their servant or by a stranger, or by some natural accident. Supposing this to be true, we are then brought to the question, whether the commissioners are responsible for this ill-construction,—whether the contractor is to be regarded as their servant, so that they may be called the makers of this work by his agency. On a careful reference to Laugher v. Pointer (n), in which the opinions delivered by Lord Tenterden, C. J., and Littledale, J., must be taken to lay down the correct law;—to Randleson v. Murray (o); Quarman v. Burnett (p); Milligan v. Wedge (q); and Rapson v. Cubitt (r),—it seems perfectly clear that, in an ordinary case, a contractor to do works of this description is not to be considered as a servant, but as a person carrying on an independent business, such as the commissioners were fully justified in employing to perform works which they could not execute for themselves, and who was known to all the world as performing them. here none of the reasons which have prevailed in cases where one person has been held liable for the acts of another as his servant. The learned judges who thought the defendant liable in Laugher v. Pointer, might, without inconsistency, have held that these commissioners are not liable. The doubt is raised by the contract, which expressly requires that all such parts of the said works to be done by Button, as are not in a particular manner specified and described in the contract, or the plans and specifications, shall be executed in such manner as the surveyor of the said works for the time being shall direct, and in a good and workmanlike manner; and such execution of the work is secured by penalties. This passage of the agreement would appear to take power from the contractor, and keep it in the hands of the commissioners, or their surveyor; but whatever may be its proper construction or effect, it has no application to the present case, for the bank which failed is a part of the works so specified and described, and for which, therefore, if ill done, the contractor is liable, and the commissioners are not. We are therefore of opinion, that the rule for a nonsuit must be absolute."

So where a company employed a contractor to build a viaduct over a road, and a stone fell on a passenger and killed him:—Held, that the company were not liable to be sued for the negligent acts of the workmen employed by the contractor.

Reedie v. L. and N. W. R. Co.

Reedie v. L. and N. W. R. Co. (r).]—Action by the widow and administratrix of R., to recover damages under 9 & 10 Vict. c. 93 (s). The declaration stated, that the company were possessed of a viaduct over a turnpike road, yet the defendants conducted themselves, in the constructing of the said viaduct, in so careless a manner, that by reason thereof a large stone fell upon R. who was then lawfully passing under the said archway, and killed him.

At the trial, it appeared that R. was passing under the viaduct, which was in the course of erection, when some workmen, employed by the contractors in the execution of the works, forced a block of stone off the parapet, which struck and killed R. on the spot.

By an act passed in 1845, a company was incorporated for the formation of the railway in question. By a deed, made between the company of the one part, and Messrs. Crawshaw of the other part, the Messrs. C. covenanted to make and complete a portion of the railway and works connected therewith, according to the specifications; and it was provided, that the company should have a right of watching the progress of the works and, if the contractors employed incompetent workmen, the company should have the power of dismissing them. Messrs. C. proceeded to execute the works, and, while they were in progress, another act passed, whereby it was enacted that the railway, with the undertakings thereof, as well as those which had been commenced, as those which had not, and all the real and personal estate of the company, should (subject to the existing debts, liabilities and contracts of the company) be vested in the defendants, and might be lawfully executed by them in the same way as they might have been executed by the said first-mentioned company. After the passing of this second act, Messrs. C. proceeded with their work, and during that time the accident occurred. A verdict was found for the plaintiff, leave being reserved to move to enter a nonsuit.

Rolfe, B., delivered the judgment of the court.—It appears to us quite clear, that after the passing of the second act, the contract with Messrs. C. was transferred to the present defendants, so as to make them liable to the same extent precisely, as the original company would have been, if the second act had not passed. But, after full consideration of the subject, we are of opinion that neither the defendants nor the original company are liable. In Quarman v. Burnett (t), this court decided, that the liability to make compensation for an injury arising from the neglect of a person driving a carriage, attaches only on the driver, or on the person employing him. The liability of any one, other than the party actually guilty of any wrongful act, proceeds on the maxim—" Qui facit per alium facit per se." The party employing has the selection of the party employed; and it is reasonable, that he who has made choice of an unskilful or careless person to execute his orders, should be responsible for any injury resulting from the want of skill or want of care of the person employed; but neither the principle of the rule, nor the rule itself, can apply to a case where the party sought to be charged does not stand in the character of employer, to the party by whose negligent act the injury has been occasioned. The doctrine of Quarman v. Burnett has since been acted on in Rapson v. Cubitt (u), in Milligan v. Wedge (x), and again in Allen v. Hayward (y). By these authorities, we must consider the law to have been settled; and the only question is, whether the law so settled is applicable to the facts of this case. To show that it was not, it was argued, that there is a recognized distinction on this subject between injuries arising from the careless or unskilful management of an animal or other personal chattel, and an injury resulting from the negligent management of fixed real property. In the latter case, it was contended that the owner is responsible for all injuries to passers-by or others, howsoever they may have been occasioned; and here it was said, that the defendants were, at the time of the accident, the owners of the railway, and so are the parties responsible. This distinction as to fixed real property is adverted to by Mr. Justice Littledale, in his very able judgment in Laugher v. Pointer (z); and it is also noticed in Quarman v. Burnett. But in neither of these cases was it necessary to decide whether such a distinction did or did not exist. The case of Bush v. Steinman (a), where the owner of a house was held liable for the act of a servant of a sub-contractor, acting under a builder employed by the owner, was a case of fixed real property. That case was strongly pressed in argument, in support of the liability of the defendant, both in Laugher v. Pointer and Quarman v. Burnett; and as the circumstances of these two cases were such as not to make it necessary to over-rule Bush v. Steinman, if any distinction in point of law did exist in cases like the present, between fixed property and ordinary moveable chattels, it was right to notice the point. But on full consideration, we have come to the conclusion that there is no such distinction, unless perhaps in cases where the act complained of is such as to amount to a nuisance (b); and, in fact, that, according to the modern decisions, Bush v. Steinman must be taken not to be law, or, at all events, that it cannot be supported on the ground on which the judgment of the court proceeded.

It is not necessary to decide, whether in any case, the owner of real property, such as land or houses, may be responsible for nuisances occasioned by the mode in which his property is used by others, not standing in the relation of servants to him, or part of his family. It may be, that in some cases, he is so responsible. But then his liability must be founded on the principle, that he has not taken due care to prevent the doing of acts, which it was his duty to prevent, whether done by his servants or others. If, for instance, a person occupying a house, or a field, should permit another to carry on there a noxious trade, so as to be a nuisance to his neighbours, it may be that he would be responsible, though the acts complained of were neither his acts nor the acts of his servants. He would have violated the rule of law—" Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas." This is referred to by Mr. Justice and North-Western R. Co.

Cresswell, in delivering judgment in Rich v. Basterfield (c), as the principle on which parties possessed of fixed property are responsible for acts of nuisance occasioned by the mode in which the property is enjoyed. And, possibly, on some such principle as this, the case of Bush v. Steinman may be supported. But certainly that doctrine cannot be applied to the case now before us. The wrongful act here could not, in any possible sense, be treated as a nuisance. It was one single act of negligence, and, in such a case, there is no principle for making any distinction, by reason of the negligence having arisen in reference to real and not to personal property. If the defendants had employed a contractor carrying on an independent business, to repair their engines or carriages, and the contractor's workmen had negligently caused a heavy piece of iron to fall on a bystander, it would appear a strange doctrine to hold, that the defendants were responsible. Mr. Justice Littledale, in his very able judgment in Laugher v. Pointer, observed, that the law does not recognize a several liability in two principals, who are unconnected; if they are jointly liable, you may sue either, but you cannot have two separately liable. This doctrine is one of general application, irrespective of the nature of the employment; and, applying the principle to the present case, it would be impossible to hold the present defendants liable, without at the same time deciding that the contractors are not liable, which it would be impossible to be contended. It remains only to be observed, that in none of the more modern cases has the alleged distinction between real and personal property been admitted. In Milligan v. Wedge, Lord Denman expresses doubt as to the existence of such a distinction in any case; and in the more recent case of Allen v. Hayward, the judgment of the court proceeded expressly on the ground that the contractor, in a case like the present, is the only party responsible. The last case so closely resembles the present, that even if we had not considered the decision right, we should probably have felt bound by it. But we see no reason to doubt its perfect correctness. It seems to follow as a necessary corollary from the principle of the preceding cases, and entirely to govern this.

Our attention was directed to the provisions of the contract, whereby the defendants had the power of insisting on the removal of careless or incompetent workmen; and so it was contended they must be responsible for their non-removal; but this power of removal does not seem to us to vary the case. The workman is still the servant of the contractor only, and the fact that the defendants might have insisted on his removal, if they thought him careless or unskilful, did not make him their servant. In Quarman v. Burnett, the particular driver was selected by the defendants; but this was held not to affect the liability of the driver's master, or to create any responsibility in the defendants; and the same principle applies here. On these grounds, this rule must be made absolute.

[In the next case in this collection (Knight v. Fox), Parke, B., speaking of the judgment in the above case, says, "that means a nuisance existing in a man's fixed property, as if the defendants had been the owners of the bridge, and in consequence of want of repair something fell from it and injured a passer-by, then it would be a question whether they would not be liable."]

Knight v. Fox (d).]—Case against defendants for negligence. The declaration stated that defendants were, by themselves and servants, in the course of erecting a railway bridge over a public street and highway, and for that purpose had erected a scaffold upon the highway. It then stated that defendants negligently fixed a piece of timber across the footpath of the highway, and kept it there by night and day, without any light or other guard or precaution to warn passengers of the same being there, or to prevent them falling over it; whereby plaintiff stumbled over the said piece of timber and was thereby thrown down and injured. Pleas, the general issue; and that defendants did not, either by themselves or servants, erect the scaffold or fix the piece of timber.

At the trial, it appeared that the London and Blackwall Co. entered into a contract with B. to effect the necessary works; who thereupon made a sub-contract with defendants, to construct a tubular bridge, principally of iron, to go across a public highway. Defendants resided at Birmingham, and paid C. a salary to attend to their general business; C. also entered into a contract with them, for the further sum of 40*l.*, to erect the scaffolding necessary for the bridge, defendants finding the materials, including gas-lights. It appeared that C. kept separate books, and himself engaged and paid the men for erecting the scaffolding. In the course of the work, one of the poles rested upon a sleeper, which was above the level of the pavement, and there being only one light placed near, the obstruction was not sufficiently visible, and plaintiff fell over it, and broke her leg. Additional lights were then put up, and these defendants paid for. On these facts it was objected that defendants were not liable; and plaintiff was nonsuited, with leave reserved to move, it being agreed that if there were any mode of putting the case to the jury in which defendants might fairly have been found liable, it should be taken that the jury had so found.

Parke, B.—I am of opinion there should be no rule granted in this case. C. was not the servant of the defendants for this purpose; quoad the contract for the scaffolding, he was quite independent. It is the same as if the defendants had contracted with a third person.

Alderson, B.—The only question is, whether the negligent act is the act of a servant of the defendants as such servant; if so, they are responsible. But it is clear upon the evidence that C. was a sub-contractor, and acting on his own account.

Pollock, C. B.—I agree that there ought to be no rule. It struck me strongly at the trial, that if B. were not liable because he had made the sub-contract with the defendants, so they were not to be made liable for the negligence of their sub-contractor. The payment for the additional lights was explained by the terms of the contract, which required the defendants to find the materials; and the lights were considered as part of the materials.—Rule refused.

Overton v. Freeman (e).]—Action for leaving a quantity of stones on a public highway, whereby defendant broke his leg by a fall. At the trial, before Jervis, C. J., W., a witness for plaintiff, stated that he had placed the kerb-stones in a street in the course of laying down some pavement there; that he was a sub-contractor, and had contracted with defendants to lay down the pavement, which he was doing under the direction of the engineer and surveyor of certain commissioners, who had, in the first instance, contracted with defendants for the work required throughout a district. W. himself paid the men who laid down the stones which caused the injury. This being the only evidence with regard to the manner in which the stones were placed there, the plaintiff was nonsuited. On motion for a new trial, Maule, J., said, after stating the facts—The question is, whether the defendants are the proper persons to be made liable for this act. It is urged that they, having committed a public nuisance, are therefore liable; and if they have done so, no doubt they are liable. It is, indeed, urged that there is some greater liability in respect of the act being a public nuisance, than in the case of an injury of a more private character. I cannot see that is a ground for holding the defendants liable (f). It seems to me rather that the liability of a person for a public wrong is and ought to be less extensive than for a civil injury. A civil liability often arises where no harm was meant, and where negligence only is charged. But, in truth, you cannot draw a parallel between the two cases. As far as it goes, however, the distinction between the two is not favourable to the view of the plaintiff. The question here is, whether the defendants did commit the nuisance in question. If they employed the persons who actually laid down the stones as their servants, no doubt they did commit it. But I cannot find any instance in which a person has been held liable in such a case as the present—unless it be in Matthews v. West London Waterworks Co. (g). It may be observed that that is only a Nisi Prius report; the particular circumstances of the case are not detailed; and it may be, as has happened in several cases, that if the court were to inform itself by obtaining the briefs used at the trial, what now certainly appears rather paradoxical, might be explained by the facts of the case. The case, as it stands, certainly somewhat countenances the position of the learned counsel. The only other case in his favour is Bush v. Steinman (h); but that decision is certainly considered erroneous in the latter cases cited, which ought not to be disturbed. One mode of inquiring whether the defendant is liable in cases like the present is, to see whether the act was done by his servant. If the person who committed the act can be so considered, the defendant will be liable; but he cannot be so considered if he is a sub-contractor. If a person is employed to do the particular thing done, the cases show that the person employing him is liable. So, in this case, the sub-contractor might be liable for the acts of his servants; but it does not follow that the defendants who contracted with him are liable for his acts. I think that this case falls within the principle of those cases which decide, that, when work is being done by a sub-contractor, he is civilly and criminally liable, and the contractor not liable. I do not mean that in no case is a contractor liable, but only that the simple character of contractor does not render him liable. He is liable if he personally interferes in the matter; and in one case it is said, "If he sanctions it." But here the defendants are sought to be charged simply because they have contracted with another man to do the work, whose servants have been guilty of negligence. They are guilty of no negligence. They contract with a person who does what is wrong, and he alone is liable. I think the rule must be refused.

Cresswell, J.—I think that the modern cases of Rapson v. Cubitt (i), Reedie v. L. and N. W. R. Co. (k), and Knight v. Fox (l), are quite conclusive. It may be true that the defendants, not having exercised any personal interference in the work, not having sanctioned the placing of the stones, but only having contracted for a lawful thing, cannot be made liable for the unlawful act of the person with whom they contracted. The defendants did not contract that the sub-contractors should lay one stone upon another so as to create a public nuisance. Paving the street was not a public nuisance. They are no parties to the laying of the stones being a public nuisance. If they had contracted that a public nuisance should be committed, it would be another matter. I do not see that the act being a public nuisance makes any difference as to the liability of the defendants.

Williams, J.—The plaintiff's counsel did not contend, in this case, that the sub-contractor was the servant of the defendants, but he said, that in cases where the act complained of constitutes a public nuisance, the sub-contractor is liable. It certainly has been thrown out in some cases, that this might be so, but in Knight v. Fox it was pointed out by Parke, B., that that doctrine does not apply in such a case as this.

Jervis, C. J.—It seems to me that Knight v. Fox is an express authority, that this action was not maintainable against the defendants.—Rule refused.

Ellis v. Sheffield Gas Co. (m).]—Action for an injury sustained by plaintiff, through the negligence of defendants.

But if a party employs a contractor to do an illegal act, he is liable for the carelessness of the contractor's workmen.

It appeared at the trial that defendants contracted with certain parties for the laying of gas-pipes along some of the streets in Sheffield, for which it was necessary to remove the pavement and dig trenches; and in consequence of the negligent manner in which the works were done, plaintiff sustained the injury. It was admitted that defendants had no act of Parliament enabling them to execute the necessary works. A verdict having been found for plaintiff, upon motion to enter it for defendant, in pursuance of leave reserved, it was contended that the contractors, not defendants, were liable.

Ellis v. Sheffield Gas Co.

Lord Campbell, C. J.—There can be no rule in this case. In the cases referred to there was nothing ordered but what the parties had a right to order, and therefore the employer would not be liable for the negligence of the contractor in the course of carrying out his contract, for there the relation of master and servant does not exist. But this is a different case; here the defendants employ a person to do what was unlawful, and the act which caused the injury of which the plaintiff complains, and is the ground of this action, was done in the course of executing those orders. Now, the defendants had certainly no right to lay open the streets in Sheffield; it was unlawful in them to take up the stones and lay down pipes, and it was in consequence of this being done that the injury happened to the plaintiff. They employed a person to do this unlawful act, and are liable to the plaintiff for the injury sustained by him.

Wightman, J.—The ground of distinction between this case and those cited is, that here the company contracted for the commission of an unlawful act. If it had not been for the culpable act of the defendants, the injury complained of could not have arisen; by their orders the pavement was taken to the place where it was left, and it was not replaced; hence the injury to the plaintiff, which is the ground of the action.

Erle, J.—The act of the contractor was an act done by him under the order and direction of the defendants, which distinguishes this case from those where the defendants were held not to be liable.—Rule refused.

Grote v. Chester and Holyhead R. Co. (n).]—Action for injuries received by plaintiff by the breaking down of a bridge. Injuries had been received by plaintiff, by the breaking down of a bridge upon defendants' line of railway, during the transit of a passenger-train. The services of an eminent engineer had been engaged in the construction of the work. The learned judge told the jury that the question was, whether the bridge was constructed and maintained with sufficient care and skill, and of reasonably proper strength, with regard to the purpose for which it was made; and, that if they should think not, and that the accident was attributable to any such deficiency, plaintiff would be entitled to recover. The counsel for defendants objected, that defendants would not be liable unless they had been guilty of negligence either in constructing or maintaining the bridge. His lordship, however, left the question to the jury, subject to his previous direction, and a verdict was given for plaintiff. Upon motion for a new trial, Pollock, C. B., said—"It does not distinctly appear whether or not the attention of the jury was directed to the proposition, that if a party, in the same situation as that in which the defendants are, employ a person who is fully competent to the work, and the best method is adopted, and the best materials are used, such party is not liable for the accident. If the jury have been directed in conformity with this rule, there is no ground for the present application. It cannot be contended that the defendants are not responsible for the accident, merely on the ground that they have employed a competent person to construct the bridge. Upon this point we will consult our learned brother." On a subsequent day his lordship said—"We have consulted the learned judge, who reports that he directed the jury in conformity with the above proposition, and therefore there will be no rule."

If a statute authorizes the use of locomotive engines on a railway running parallel with an ancient highway, an indictment for a nuisance will not lie, although the horses of persons travelling on the highway are frightened by the engines.

R. v. Pease.

R. v. Pease (q).]—By an act, reciting that a railway would be of great public utility, and would assist the agricultural interest and the general traffic of the country, power was given to a company to make such railway according to a plan deposited, from which they were not to deviate more than 100 yards. By a subsequent act, the company were empowered to use locomotive engines upon the railway. The railway was made parallel to an ancient highway, and in some places within five yards of it. It did not appear whether or not the line could have been made to pass at a greater distance. The locomotive engines frightened the horses of persons using the highway. At the trial of an indictment against the company for a nuisance, it was decided that this interference with the rights of the public must be taken to have been sanctioned by the legislature. The following judgment was delivered:—"The question is, whether the statute gives an authority to the company to use locomotive engines on the railway absolutely, or only with some implied condition or qualification, that they should employ all practicable means to protect the public against any injury from them; and those means were, on the argument, suggested to be, the altering the course of the railroad, or the erection of fences or screens of sufficient height to exclude the view of the engines from the passengers on the highway. Now, the words of the clause clearly give to the company the unqualified authority to use the engines; and we are to construe provisions in acts of Parliament according to the ordinary sense of the words, unless such construction would lead to some unreasonable result, or be inconsistent with, or contrary to, the declared or implied intention of the framer of the law, in which case the grammatical sense of the words may be extended or modified; instances of which are to be found in Eyston v. Studd (r). Let us, then, consider whether there is anything unreasonable or contrary to the express or implied intention of the legislature, in construing these words in their ordinary sense, and without any such addition or qualification as before mentioned. It is clear that the makers of these acts had in view the construction of a railroad in a certain defined line, which had been delineated on a map, and from which line the road was not to deviate more than 100 yards. The legislature, therefore, must be presumed to have known that the railroad would be adjacent for a mile to the public highway, and consequently that travellers upon the highway would be in all probability incommoded by the passage of locomotive engines along the railroad. That being presumed, there is nothing unreasonable or inconsistent in supposing that the legislature intended that the part of the public which should use the highway should sustain some inconvenience for the sake of the greater good to be obtained by other parts of the public, in the more speedy travelling and conveyance of merchandize along the new railroad. Can any one say that the public interests are unjustly dealt with, when the injury to one line of communication is compensated by the increased benefit of another? So far is such a proceeding from being unreasonable, that it was held, by the majority of the judges, in R. v. Russell (s), that a nuisance was excusable on that principle, at common law; and whether that be the law or not, at least it is clear that an express provision of the legislature, having that effect, cannot be unreasonable. It is true that the same object, that of giving one part of the public the benefit of the use of these engines, might have been effected without the same injury to the other part using the road, if the act had imposed on the company the obligation of erecting a sufficient screen at their own cost, or had provided that the line of road should be different at that place; but it is by no means necessary to imply such an obligation in order to make the clause reasonable and consistent, for it has been shown to be so without it; and it is natural to suppose that if such a condition had been intended, it would have been particularly expressed. For these reasons, we think that the defendants were justified."—Judgment for the defendants.

R. v. Morris (t).]—Defendant, proprietor of a colliery, made a railroad from it to a seaport town. The railroad was 400 yards long, and was laid upon a turnpike road, which was narrowed so far, that in some places there was not a clear space for two carriages to pass. Defendant allowed the public to use his railroad, paying a toll. It was decided, that the facility given to the general traffic with the seaport, and particularly to the conveyance of coals, &c., thither, was not such a convenience as justified the obstruction of the highway.

It was decided, that the act did not authorize the laying of such wagon-way, where there were not twenty yards of road on each side.

lands, mines, &c., to make railways through their own lands and those of other persons consenting, and across and along any road or roads to communicate with the principal railway; and no reference was made to any former limitation of powers. On these facts it was decided, that the power in this clause was not absolutely given, but must be subject to the provision of sect. 5, or to the condition of leaving space enough, independent of the railways, for the public to pass.

Construction of a special act, as to the powers of the company to lay down runs on a road adjoining to the railway, for the transit of goods to a wharf.

London and Brighton R. Co. v. Cooper.

London and Brighton R. Co. v. Cooper (u).—The preamble of an act, after reciting that the establishment of a railway communication between London and Brighton would be of great public advantage, enacted (sect. 3), that it shall be lawful for the company to make a main line of railway and branches, with all proper warehouses, wharfs, and all other suitable works, communications, approaches and conveniences attached to or connected with the same. By sect. 12, the usual powers are conferred for making and maintaining the railway, and to make upon, across or over any roads, &c., such roads, ways, cuttings, &c., as the company shall think proper. The company having purchased a private wharf, separated from one of their terminus stations by a turnpike road, laid down on the road stone blocks, so as to form two runs or stone-ways, level with the road, for the purpose of facilitating the passage of goods from the wharf, across the road to the station. It was decided, that the company were not authorized to interfere with the road in such a manner; and an injunction which had been granted to restrain the trustees of the road from removing the stone blocks was dissolved, although, in the opinion of the court, no damage could result from the stone blocks, either to the road, or the passengers upon it.

Lord Cottenham, C., said—"The question is, whether I can find in this act any reasonable doubt that what the company have done is supported by their act; and after paying great attention to the clauses to which I have been referred, I cannot find any one which gives them even a colour of title. The 12th section, no doubt, is as large as possible in describing what the company may do; but there are those words at the commencement which limit the whole operation: it must be for the purposes and subject to the provisions and restrictions of the act. Not only, therefore, must you find words in the enacting clause, sufficient to justify what is done, but you must find that what is intended to be done, under that power, is for the purposes and subject to the provisions and restrictions of the act. [Here his lordship described the works complained of.] However, this is not for the purposes of the railway itself, and is therefore not a work within the meaning of the section. There are provisions enabling the company to deal with the turnpike road, if it is for the purposes of the railway; but if they wish to make another road, they cannot take the turnpike road for that purpose. What the company have done to this road is not for the purposes of the act, or within its provisions. If it is a common road of communication made for the purposes of easy access to the railway, then I do not find anything in the act authorizing the company to deal with the road at all."

proper or necessary for making, maintaining, repairing or using the railway and other works by the act authorized, or which may obstruct the making, maintaining or using the same; and it empowers the company, according to the provisions and restrictions of the act, to make inclined planes, tunnels, embankments, bridges, &c. Sect. 96 enacts, that the lands to be taken for the line of the railway shall not exceed twenty-two yards in breadth, except where a greater width may be required for either embankments or cuttings.

Semble, that the company have not under these clauses power, by compulsory process, to purchase land for the purpose of making an embankment upon other and lower land on a different part of the line.

A point involving questions of practical science being in dispute, and the affidavits being conflicting, the evidence was, at the suggestion of the court, and with the consent of both parties, referred to an engineer for his report on the question in dispute, and the conclusion of the engineer with respect to the facts was adopted by, and made the ground of the order of, the court (y).

A railway company will not be prevented by injunction from taking lands for purposes warranted by their act, on the ground that, previously to the filing of the bill, and before the necessity of taking it for such purposes was made known to the plaintiff, the company had endeavoured to take the same lands for other purposes not so warranted.

Ambiguous words in acts of Parliament, authorizing a public company to take land by compulsory process, are to be construed against the company and in favour of private property.

Rowe v. Shilson (z).]—An embankment company was, by an act of Parliament (not limited in duration), empowered to make a road, and to erect turnpikes upon or across “any lanes or ways leading or that might thereafter lead out of the same,” and to take tolls at such turnpikes. By subsequent acts another company was empowered to make a railway, and it was enacted, that all persons should have free liberty to use the same, with carriages properly constructed, upon payment only of such rates and tolls as should be demanded by the railway company, not exceeding the sums mentioned in that act. The railway was afterwards made, and crossed the embankment company’s road. It was decided that the railway, though made and opened to the public by act of Parliament, was a “way” within the meaning of the first-mentioned act. Secondly, that the clause in favour of the public in the railway act did not take away the vested right of the embankment company to their tolls; and, consequently, that they might take toll of persons crossing their road upon the railway.

(a).]—By sect. 100 of an act it was enacted, “That where any bridge shall be erected by the company for the purpose of carrying the railway over or across any turnpike road, the span of the arch of such bridge shall be formed, and shall at all times be and be continued, of such width as to leave a clear and open space under every arch of not less than twenty-five feet.”

The company erected a temporary bridge across a turnpike road by the side of a permanent bridge, for the purpose of carrying spare earth over the road, whereby the road was narrowed to less than twenty-five feet under the bridge, and an injunction was thereupon applied for to prevent the company from using the bridge.

A temporary bridge across a turnpike road held to be within the provisions of a section in a railway act; but an injunction was refused, and, in lieu thereof, the company were put under certain terms.

v. Eastern

Sir K. Bruce, V. C.—I am of opinion that, although the bridge is a temporary one, and adjoining the regularly made bridge, yet sect. 100 has not been complied with, and, on that ground at least, what has been done is illegal; and taking the whole act together, I think there has been an infraction of the law, and that, too, without any favourable circumstances. No case of great practical inconvenience has been made out, and I do not think it necessary to interfere by injunction. The court will exercise its discretion according to circumstances, and although there may have been an infraction of the law, it will endeavour to do substantial justice to one party without imposing unnecessary hardship on the other, especially in a case where the legal tribunals are open. [His Honor suspended the injunction, and put the company under terms.]

*R. v. York and

R. v. York and North Midland R. Co. (b).—By a railway act the company were required, sect. 88, “to make proper watering-places for cattle, in all cases where, by means of the railway, the cattle of any persons occupying lands adjacent thereto should be deprived of access to their ancient watering-places.” After this act passed, and during the progress through Parliament of a subsequent act for amending the first act, by an indenture between the railway company and M., in consideration of M.’s withdrawing all opposition to the bill, the company covenanted “that they would pay to M., as and for the special damage to be thereby occasioned to his estate and mansion-house, 5,000*l.*; and that whenever any close, &c., of M. should be intersected by the railway, the different parts adjoining should be thrown together and levelled, &c.; and that the company should make and complete such good and sufficient fences, drains, gates, stiles and other conveniences, as might be necessary for the re-dividing of the fields which might be intersected by the railway, and for laying them to the adjoining fields of the same estates for the purpose of convenient occupation.” The 5,000*l.* were paid by the company, and under the indenture M. had given notice to the company to make certain fences, drains, crossings, gates, and also ponds in portions of the lands which had been intersected and cut off from the ancient watering-places. On the refusal of the company to make such ponds or watering-places, a mandamus was applied for, and a return made.

Lord Denman, C. J.—The defendants say they executed the works required, except the ponds, and they conclude by alleging that the cutting off of ponds and watering-places, and damages occasioned thereby, were part of the special damages covered by the 5,000*l.*; and further, that the ponds they are required to make were not conveniences within the meaning of the indenture last set forth. We are of opinion the indenture furnishes no sufficient answer to the writ. The special damages for which the 5,000*l.* were paid are evidently such as were peculiar to M. in the alteration of the line, of whatever nature they may be, and not such damages as might happen to any person whose lands were intersected; such damages are, in the very clause of the indenture, pointed out as ordinary damages, and sect. 88 provides for them in terms. The indenture was made long after the act, and the clause in the indenture seems almost exactly to refer to that section, among others, in the act. With respect to the other clauses in the indenture, it is plain the words “conveniences” there used does not apply to all things necessary for the occupation of the land, but to all things necessary for the re-dividing and laying the intersected closes to the adjoining land for the purpose of convenient occupation—it is the laying the lands together to which those words must be applied, not to making fences and other conveniences; added to which, sect. 88 obliges the company to supply water, and gives them power to go even over the lands of a third person, which, if the clause of the indenture were to receive the construction of the defendants, would relate only to making ponds on the lands of M. At all events, it cannot alter the obvious meaning of the indenture itself.—Peremptory writ of mandamus awarded (c).

(c) A writ of error was afterwards brought, and the court reversed the decision, on the ground that the writ of mandamus required more than one watering-place to be made, without disclosing any obligation on the part of the company to make more than one. See York and North Midland R. Co. v. Milner, 15 L. J. (Q. B.) 379.

I. Origin of the Jurisdiction of the Board.

WE propose to give a short sketch of the manner in which the legislature has endeavoured, by means of a public board, to exercise a control over the proceedings of railway companies. The parliamentary powers now entrusted to the Board of Trade derive their origin from recommendations which have, from time to time, emanated from committees appointed by Parliament. As early as 1839, a Select Committee on Railways, appointed by the House of Commons, expressed a strong opinion that a board would be required to superintend railways, "for the purpose of protecting the weak against the strong, and counteracting the evils incident to monopoly(a);" but the committee did not recommend that the proposed board should interfere with railway legislation.

In 1841, another committee, which was appointed by the Commons, "to consider whether it was desirable for the public safety to vest a discretionary power of issuing regulations, for the prevention of accidents upon railways, in the Board of Trade; and if so, under what conditions and limitations,"—by their report negatived the proposition thus submitted to them, and recommended that the Board of Trade should exercise their supervision over railways, in the way of suggestion, rather than by positive regulations.

The next Select Committee, appointed February 5th, 1844, presented six reports to the House of Commons within as many months, and many of the statutory powers given to the Board of Trade derive their origin from the recommendations and suggestions made in these reports. The committee state that they entered upon their inquiries with a strong prepossession against any general interference by the government in the management and working of railways, and that they had not seen cause to alter their first impressions upon that subject. But with regard to railway legislation, they were convinced that it was alike clear, from reason and from experience, that it should thenceforward be subjected to an habitual and effective supervision on the part of the government.

The committee also recommended "that an efficient supervising power should be constituted on the part of the public, to assist the judgment of the houses of legislature, and that general principles should be laid down to guide its proceedings;" and, finally, they recommended that railway bills should for the future be submitted to the Board of Trade, previously to their coming under the notice of Parliament, with regard to certain enumerated subjects.

But the committee stated it to be their opinion, that such reports should on no account be regarded in any other light than as intended to afford to Parliament,—first, additional aid in the elucidation of the facts by the testimony of witnesses, competent by knowledge, habit and opportunity, and officially responsible; and, secondly, recommendations founded upon such elucidation: that their purport should be, not in any case to give the absolute advice that a given railway should be made, but to state whether or not there were public reasons which ought, in the opinion of the department, to be decisive against it, or whether it ought to be postponed until its merits could be examined in connection with those of some other scheme, or which of two or more contending schemes appeared preferable, in the event that only one should appear likely to receive the sanction of Parliament. And for the purpose of carrying these suggestions into effect, the committee recommended that the railway department of the Board of Trade should be enlarged, and its organization improved.

Parliament subsequently adopted these recommendations; and, by various resolutions embodied in the Standing Orders of both houses of Parliament, it was required that the Board of Trade should be furnished with certain documents and other information, to enable them to exercise their then intended supervision over projected railway schemes; and during the session of 1845, the Board of Trade reported upon the numerous and very important railway schemes which came before Parliament in the course of that session (b).

The experiment thus made did not prove successful (c); and, after the reports we have mentioned had been made, it was deemed desirable by the board to make some alterations in the mode of conducting the business of the railway department, which was carried into effect by a minute bearing date the 10th July, 1845.

Amongst other things, the lords of the committee directed, by this minute, that proper steps should be taken for submitting to the two houses of Parliament (d) the necessity of adopting resolutions requiring the promoters of the various schemes—to deposit, as theretofore, at the Board of Trade, a copy of the plans, sections, &c.; also that they

(b) Mr. Laing states, in his evidence given before the Select Committee on Railway Bills (2nd Report), that, for the session 1845, plans and projects were deposited at the Board of Trade by the promoters of 248 distinct projects. Upwards of 700 plans were deposited previously to the session 1846; about 350 previously to the session 1863; 344 (of which 294 were new) previously to the session 1864; and about 350 previously to the session 1865.

(c) The committee remark, "The plan pursued by Lord Dalhousie in 1845, of subjecting each particular scheme to detailed investigation—though universal opinion testifies to the zeal, carefulness, and ability of those investigations—failed to ensure the general confirmation of its recommendations by the committees to which they were submitted."—Fifth Report, 1853, p. 14.

(d) By referring to the Standing Orders it will be seen that these recommendations have been attended to by the legislature. A copy of all plans, sections, and books of reference, with a map, with the line of railway delineated thereon, and a copy of the Gazette notice, must be deposited at the Board of Trade, on or before the 30th November.—Commons, S. O. (1865), 32, 33; Lords, S. O. 182, ss. 5—8; ante, 13.

A printed copy of every railway bill must also be deposited on or before the 23rd December.—Commons, S. O. 40, ante, 14. And of amended bills; ibid, 82; Lords, S. O. 182, s. 11. And also two days after a bill from the Commons is read a first time in the Lords, and again three days before the third reading in the Lords.—Lords, S. O. 182, s. 12.

So by a recommendation from some officer of the Board, the committee on the bill may authorize steeper ascents over roads than they could otherwise allow.—Commons, S. O. 146; Lords, S. O. 189, s. 2.

Nor can a railway cross a road on a level, unless the Board of Trade report thereon.—Commons, S. O. 147. The certificate of the Board of Trade, that one half the capital has been paid up and expended, is required in certain cases of purchase, sale, lease, or amalgamation.—Commons, S. O. 156; Lords, S. O. 189, s. 9. All reports made on railway bills by the Board are referred by the House to the Committee on the Bill.—Commons, S. O. 187; Lords, S. O. 189, s. 13.

should be required to deposit, concurrently with their plans and sections, a sketch of the proposed lines, on an Ordnance Map of England, or on a scale equal to such Ordnance Map, and also a written statement containing a description of the railway, &c.; and that the promoters should deposit, as theretofore, with the Board of Trade, a copy of the bill, as well as of such amendments as may be made during its progress.

The Lords also expressed their intention to draw the attention of Parliament, by a report, to certain subjects, as they might from time to time see fit (e).

But the experience of another session of Parliament did not confirm the authority of the Board; and, in 1846, another Select Committee of the House of Commons recommended the appointment of a separate tribunal, which might command the public confidence; and accordingly by 9 & 10 Vict. c. 105, the powers previously vested in the Board of Trade were, with additional powers, transferred to and vested in a separate department, called Commissioners of Railways (f). This separate Board continued in existence until 1851,

(f) A question, attended with important results, seems to arise on the construction of this act of Parliament, when looked at in connection with 14 & 15 Vict. c. 64, post, Appendix, which was passed for the purpose of repealing the first-mentioned act, and re-vesting the powers of the Commissioners in the Board of Trade. The case stands thus:—Under various acts, certain powers over railways had been vested in the Board of Trade. These powers were transferred by 9 & 10 Vict. c. 105, to the Commissioners of Railways. And the point to be considered is, whether that act did not, by necessary implication, repeal those portions of all former acts which had invested the Board of Trade with authority over railways. By sect. 1 of the last-mentioned act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 105), after reciting that by certain public acts enumerated, and certain private acts, certain powers with respect to railways were vested in the Board of Trade, and that it was expedient that a separate department should be constituted for those purposes, and other purposes relating to railways, her Majesty is empowered to appoint commissioners of railways; and then by sect. 2, which is the important section for our present inquiry, it is enacted, that “from and after the day which shall be specified in the ‘London Gazette’ as the day on which the said commissioners shall begin to act in execution of this act, all the powers, rights and authority now vested in or exercised by the lords of the committee of her Majesty’s Privy Council for Trade and Foreign Plantations, by virtue of the recited acts, or by any other act of Parliament, or otherwise howsoever, with respect to any railway, or intended railway, shall be transferred to and vested in and exercised by the commissioners of railways, as fully as if they had been named in the said several acts of Parliament, instead of the lords of the said committee; and all provisions of the said acts shall be deemed to apply to the said commissioners instead of the lords of the said committee; and all proceedings now pending before the lords of the said committee, or carried on under their authority, shall be continued and carried on by and before the said commissioners, who shall have and exercise the same powers, rights and authority, in respect of all such proceedings, as if they had been originally commenced before the said commissioners.” Can it then be successfully contended that this section does not, by necessary implication, repeal all such parts of the acts mentioned in the preamble, as conferred powers over railways upon the Board of Trade? In other words, would the Board of Trade have had a co-ordinate jurisdiction over railway matters after the passing of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 105, and the issuing of the notice in the Gazette, just as if that act had not passed? It is submitted that they would not. If this is the true answer to the inquiry, it seems necessarily to follow that 14 & 15 Vict. c. 64, is very imperfectly framed, and that it has failed to re-vest, in the Board of Trade, the powers which were transferred to and exercised by the commissioners under the authority of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 105. It must be remembered that, by 13 & 14 Vict. c. 21, s. 5,

when by 14 & 15 Vict. c. 105, it was also abolished, and the Board of Trade were again entrusted with the powers previously vested in the Commissioners of Railways. Whatever further changes may be made, it may perhaps be reasonably inferred, by a perusal of the very able Report made by the Select Committee of the House of Commons, in 1853, that the functions exercised by this department of the executive government will not be hereafter extended to the originating or controlling railway legislation (g). The committee say on this subject, "In a country so rapidly advancing in prosperity as England, and in respect of a system so new, and where so much is still matter of progress and of experience, as the system of railway communication, and where such great interests are involved, and so much ability and enterprise are constantly at work, it is futile to lay down general rules in words, unless provision be made for the steady application of those rules to the varying circumstances which from time to time arise. Hence, all the most intelligent witnesses whom your committee have examined, have pointed to some tribunal which might be invested by Parliament with so high a degree of authority as to give weight and stability to its decisions, and thus, by creating it is enacted, that, "where any act, repealing in the whole or in part any former act, is itself repealed, such last repeal shall not revive the act or provisions before repealed, unless words be added reviving such act or provisions." Now in 14 & 15 Vict. c. 64, no such words are added. The statute, after reciting the above-mentioned act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 105, and that it was expedient that the same should be repealed, and provision be made for the exercise and performance of the powers and duties which, since the passing of the said act, had been invested in or imposed upon the commissioners, enacts, by sect. 1, "that from and after the 10th October, 1851, the said act shall be repealed, and all powers, rights, authorities, and duties vested in, or exercised or performed by the commissioners of railways, *under any act passed since the passing of the said recited act, or which may be passed during the present session of Parliament, shall be transferred to, and vested in, and performed by the lords of the committee of her Majesty's Privy Council for Trade and Foreign Plantations, as if they had been named in such acts instead of the said commissioners; and all proceedings pending before the said commissioners on the said 10th of October, or carried on under their authority, shall be continued and carried on by and before the lords of the said committee, who shall have, exercise and perform the same powers, rights, authorities and duties, in respect of all such proceedings, as might have been exercised or performed by such commissioners in case this act had not been passed."

By sect. 2, The lords of the said committee, with the approval of the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, may continue, for the transaction of the business transferred to the lords of the said committee under this act, all or any of the officers and servants appointed by the Commissioners of Railways, and from time to time, with such approval, remove such officers and servants, or any of them.

It will be seen that in the above Chapter "On the Jurisdiction of the Board of Trade," the author has not adopted the views of the statute which are here suggested, for the effect of giving force to them would be to show that nearly all the important acts of the Board of Trade transacted since 10th October, 1851 (including the appointment of umpires, and all other authorities exercised under the Consolidation Acts), are acts done without jurisdiction; so that the title to lands may be affected, and many other like untoward results may readily be suggested.

(g) Fifth Report on Railways and Canal Bills, printed 8th July, 1858, p. 14. The committee, in their Report, suggested that the Board of Trade should be authorized, by the mutual consent of the companies, to decide disputes arising between them. See Recommendation, No. 8. This recommendation appears to have been carried into effect by 22 & 23 Vict. c. 59, post, Appendix.

* If, in lieu of the words in italics, the language had been "under any act heretofore passed," no such question as is suggested could have arisen.

in the public mind a more certain anticipation as to the result of parliamentary conflict, discourage idle or unprincipled speculations, and give to railway property that confidence, which is not only desirable to the holders of that property, but might be made eminently conducive to the public good. That this tribunal cannot be erected altogether without the walls of Parliament appears to your committee to be obvious, both from general considerations of the nature of representative government, and from the experience of such attempts as have been heretofore made to lighten the labours of Parliament by preliminary inquiries upon different subjects, conducted through the agency of the executive government."

The committee thereupon proceed to recommend the appointment of a permanent standing committee in the House of Commons, at the commencement of each session, to whom all railway and canal bills may be hereafter referred (h), and they intimated that the railway department would be in possession of much information "which would be valuable to the committee; and they should present at the commencement of the session a comprehensive report upon the general nature of the schemes for the year, together with detailed reports upon the provisions contained in the several bills, and that, for all questions which it might be found convenient to dispose of in the way of reference, the agency of the department would at all times be available whenever the committee should require it." The Standing Orders now provide for the appointment of the committee thus recommended, which is called "The General Committee on Railway and Canal Bills," and is nominated at the commencement of every session by the Committee of Selection (i).

We shall now consider the extent of the powers which have been entrusted to, or are now exercised by, the Board of Trade, by the statute law.

It must be observed,—1st, that this subject is discussed, without reference to any powers which may be conferred on the Board of Trade by any special railway act, such powers having reference only to the particular railway (k): and 2ndly, that, as a clause is now inserted in the special acts, by which new companies, or companies applying for further powers, are made subject to the provisions of all general acts relating to railways, the following provisions are applicable to all such companies.

II. Authority of the Board of Trade over Railway Bills promoted in Parliament.

9 & 10 Vict. c. 105,
s. 11.

Before 9 & 10 Vict. c. 105, which established the Board of Commissioners of Railways (l), the interference of the Board of Trade with railway schemes promoted in Parliament arose, as we have seen (m), by the resolutions of Parliament, enforced by their Standing Orders, which require the promoters of railway bills to deposit plans and sections, with copies of the intended bills, and other information, at the Board of Trade. But the above mentioned statute, after enacting that the powers of the Board of Trade should be transferred to the newly constituted commissioners, enacted, by sect. 11, that it should be the duty of the commissioners to make a preliminary report on certain specified matters, and the commissioners and their officers were empowered to survey and inspect proposed railways, and, for the purposes of such survey, they were armed with the powers contained in the Ordnance Survey Act (4 & 5 Vict. c. 30). But as we have seen that 9 & 10 Vict. c. 105, was repealed by 14 & 15 Vict. c. 64, it follows that such preliminary inquiries, when made by the Board of Trade, for the purposes of these reports, are not now made under any statutory authority (n).

III. Authority of the Board of Trade to grant Certificates under "The Railway Companies Powers Act, 1864."

27 & 28 Vict.
c. 120, s. 3, App.

By "The Railway Companies Powers Act, 1864," in each of the following cases, namely,—

I. Where a railway company are desirous that authority should be given to themselves and some other railway company or companies to enter into an agreement with respect to all or any of the matters following, namely,

The maintenance and management of the railways of the companies respectively, or of any one or more of them, or of any part thereof respectively:

The use and working of the railways or railway, or of any part thereof, and the conveyance of traffic thereon:

(l) Ante, 431.

(m) Ante, 429.

(n) When the Admiralty may cause a preliminary inquiry to be made, if a port or river be interfered with, see 14 & 15 Vict. c. 49, post, App.

The fixing, collecting and apportionment of the tolls, rates, charges, receipts and revenues levied, taken or arising in respect of traffic:

Authority of Board to grant Certificates under "Railway Companies Powers Act, 1864."

The joint ownership, maintenance, management and use of a station or other work, or the separate ownership, maintenance, management and use of several parts of a station or other work.

II. Where a railway company are desirous of obtaining an extension of the time limited for the sale by them of superfluous lands.

III. Where a railway company, incorporated by a special act or by certificate under "The Railways Construction Facilities Act, 1864," are desirous of obtaining authority to raise additional capital.

In any such case the company may apply to the Board of Trade Sect. 4. for a certificate under "The Railway Companies Powers Act, 1864," upon complying with the requisites of that act. But it is not Sect. 24. obligatory on the Board of Trade to grant a certificate. And any Sect. 7. railway or canal company, desirous of opposing the application, may give notice to that effect to the Board of Trade. In such case the Board cannot proceed with the application, but must lay it before Parliament, and all further proceeding must then be taken in Parliament. There is no provision, however, in the act for the case of individuals wishing to oppose the application. The provisions of the act will be found at length in the Appendix.

IV. Authority of the Board of Trade to grant Certificates under "The Railways Construction Facilities Act, 1864."

By "The Railways Construction Facilities Act, 1864," where all 27 & 28 Vict. c. 121, App. landowners and other parties beneficially interested are consenting to the making of a railway or the execution of a work, the promoters may apply to the Board of Trade for a certificate under that act. Such promoters, and all parties interested, may enter into provisional Sect. 3. contracts for the purchase of land, and must then publish notices of Sect. 6. their intended application, according to the general rules under the act (which the Board of Trade have power to alter (sect. 64)). They must also deposit maps, plans, sections and books of reference, and an estimate of the expense of the construction of the railway, and lodge a draft of the proposed certificate with the Board of Trade, according to the same rules. But it is not obligatory on the Board Sect. 52. of Trade to grant a certificate. And any railway or canal company desirous of opposing the application may give notice to that effect to the Board of Trade. In such case the Board cannot proceed with the application, but must lay the draft certificate before Parliament, and all further proceedings must then be taken in Parliament. There is no provision in the act for the case of individuals wishing to oppose the application. The provisions of the act will be found at length in the Appendix.

V. Authority of the Board of Trade over Railways of illegal Gauge.

9 & 10 Vict. c. 57,
App. 106.

By the act for regulating the gauge of railways it is enacted, that, with certain exceptions, four feet eight inches and a half in England, and five feet three inches in Ireland, shall be the future gauge of railways for the conveyance of passengers.

Sect. 7.

If any railway is constructed or altered contrary to that act, the company are liable to a penalty of 10*l.* per mile per day, which may be recovered under the provisions of "The Railways Clauses Act, 1845" (o). And, besides that penalty, the railway may be abated by the Board of Trade.

VI. Authority of the Board of Trade to sanction Deviations in executing Engineering Works, and to protect Navigation.

8 & 9 Vict. c. 20,
s. 12, App. 77.

Owners of adjoining lands may appeal to Board of Trade against deviations.

By the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, the Board of Trade are enabled to sanction deviations in executing engineering works upon railways, in certain specified cases. That act, as we have seen (p), requires that the railway shall be kept at certain levels, as referred to the common datum line in the parliamentary section, unless the consent of the owners of adjoining property, or of two justices, can be obtained; but in all such cases of consent, the company are required to give public notice of the intended deviations, and the owners of any lands prejudicially affected thereby may apply to the Board of Trade, who are empowered to decide whether, having regard to the interests of the applicants, such proposed deviation is proper to be made, and they may, by their certificate, either disallow the making of such deviation, or authorize its being made.

Board of Trade may authorize deviations by certificate.

Sect. 14 forbids companies from deviating from or altering the gradients, curves, tunnels, or other engineering works, as described in the parliamentary section, except within certain prescribed limits; but provides, that gradients may be altered to any further extent, which shall be certified by the Board of Trade to be consistent with public safety, and not prejudicial to the public interest; and in like manner the radius of a curve may be diminished, or a tunnel substituted for an open cutting, if such alterations be authorized by a certificate from the Board (q). And sect. 66, after reciting that expense might frequently be avoided, and public convenience promoted, by a reference to the Board of Trade, upon the construction of public works of an engineering nature connected with the railway, where a strict compliance with that act, or the special act, might be impossible, or attended with inconvenience to the company, and without adequate advantage to the public,—enacts, that, if any difference in regard to the construction, alteration, or restoration of any road, or bridge, or other public work of an engineering nature, should arise between the company and any trustees, &c., or other persons, either party, after giving notice to the other, may apply to the Board of Trade to decide on the proper manner of constructing, &c., such work, and the Board may then, if they think fit, decide the same accordingly (r), and authorize, by certificate, any arrangement or mode of construction, in regard to such work, which shall appear to them, either to be in substantial compliance with the provisions of that and the special act, or to be calculated to afford equal or greater accommodation to the public; but no such certificate can be granted, unless the Board are satisfied that existing private rights or interests will not be injuriously affected thereby (s).

Engineering Works.

Board of Trade may modify construction of certain roads, bridges, &c., where strict compliance with act impossible or inconvenient.

Sect. 66.

The Railways Clauses Act, 1863, also, as we have seen (t), gives further authority to the Board of Trade to sanction alterations in engineering works.

26 & 27 Vict.
c. 92, s. 4, App.

That act also contains various provisions giving authority to the Board of Trade to require certain things to be done for the protection of navigation.

Provisions for protection of navigation.

Thus, where a company is authorized by the special act to construct, alter or extend, any work on, in, over, through or across tidal lands or a tidal water, the company must (under a penalty of 20*l.* a night), on or near the work during the whole time of construction, &c., exhibit and keep burning, at their own expense, every night from sunset to sunrise, such lights (if any) as the Board of Trade from time to time requires or approves; and (notwithstanding the enactments for the time being in force respecting lighthouses) must also (under a similar penalty), on or near the work, when completed, always maintain, exhibit, and keep burning, at their own expense, every night from sunset to sunrise, such lights (if any), for the guidance of ships, as the Board of Trade from time to time requires or approves.

And where the company is authorized or required by the special act to construct a bridge over a navigable tidal water, and the special act does not make express provision respecting the span or spans thereof, then the company shall construct the same with a span or spans of such headway and waterway, and with such opening span or spans (if any), and according to such plan, as the Board of Trade directs or approves.

User of bridges.
Sect. 15.

Where the company constructs a bridge with an opening span, the company is subject to and must abide by such regulations, with regard to the user of the bridge, as may from time to time be made by the Board of Trade, under a penalty not exceeding 20*l*.

Access to the shore under or across the railway.
Sect. 16.

And where the railway cuts off access between the land and a tidal water or tidal lands, the company must, during the construction of the railway and from time to time thereafter, make and permanently maintain, and allow to be used by all persons at all times, free of toll or other charge, all such footways and carriage-ways over, under or across the railway, or on a level therewith, as the Board of Trade directs or approves (subject to certain provisos). Where the footway or carriage-way is made across the railway on the level, then the manner of making and watching the level crossing is subject to the approval of the Board of Trade.

Prohibition of deviation of certain works without consent of Board of Trade.
Sect. 17.

Where a company is authorized by the special act to construct a railway skirting a public navigable tidal river or channel, the company must not make any deviation of the railway from the continuous centre line thereof marked on the plan deposited by them at the Board of Trade, even within the limits of deviation shown on that plan, in such manner as to diminish the navigable space, without the previous consent of the Board of Trade, or otherwise than in such manner as is expressly authorized by the Board of Trade. If any deviation is made in contravention of this section, the Board of Trade may abate and remove the work in the construction whereof the deviation is made, or any part thereof, and restore the site thereof to its former condition, at the expense of the company: and the amount of such expense shall be a debt due from the company to the crown, and be recoverable accordingly, with costs, or may be recovered, with costs, as a penalty is recoverable from the company.

Abatement of work abandoned or decayed.
Sect. 18.

If a work constructed by the company on, in, over, through or across tidal lands or a tidal water is abandoned or suffered to fall into decay, the Board of Trade may abate and remove the work, or any part of it, and restore the site thereof to its former condition, at the expense of the company: (such expenses to be recovered as is provided by sect. 17, supra.)

Survey of works by Board of Trade.
Sect. 19.

If at any time the Board of Trade deems it expedient, for the purposes of the special act or this part of this act, to order a survey and examination of a work constructed by the company on, in, over, through or across tidal lands or tidal water, or of the intended site of any such work, the company shall defray the expense of the survey and examination: (such expense to be recovered as is provided by sect. 17, supra.)

VII. Authority of the Board of Trade to inspect a Railway before it is opened for Public Use.

No railway, or any portion of a railway (u), can be opened for the public conveyance of passengers, until one calendar month after notice of the intention of opening it has been given to the Board of Trade by the company (x), and until ten days after notice has also been given of the time when the railway will be, in the opinion of the company, sufficiently completed for the safe conveyance of passengers, and ready for inspection (y). Upon receipt of this latter notice the Board of Trade appoint an engineer officer to inspect the line in question (z), and give notice to that effect to the railway company. The officer so appointed is authorized at all reasonable times to enter upon and examine the railway, and the stations, works, and buildings, engines and carriages (a); and if any person wilfully obstructs him in the execution of his duty, a justice may fine the offender 10*l.* (b). If that officer reports that the opening would be attended with danger to the public, by reason of the incompleteness of the works and permanent way, or the insufficiency of the establishment for working the railway, together with the grounds of his opinion, the Board of Trade may, from time to time, order and direct the company to postpone the opening, for any period not exceeding one month at a time, until it appears that such opening may take place without danger to the public (c): but such order is not binding on the company, unless a copy of the report of the officer be delivered to the company with the order (d).

First notice.

Second notice.

(u) Where it is proposed to open a second line of rails the company are required to forward to the Board of Trade a statement of the new works and permanent way which have been constructed in laying down this second line of rails, and to furnish drawings of all bridges and viaducts not previously sent; and as these documents will become official records of the line and works inspected, each document must be signed by the engineer, or some other responsible officer of the company, whose duty makes him acquainted with its contents. As inconvenience has frequently been experienced from the opening of new lines of railway having been postponed by the inspecting officer of the Board of Trade in consequence of the lines being incomplete in certain particulars, it is usually deemed advisable to transmit, at the same time, a statement marked B of some of those requirements in which deficiencies have occurred.

Branch lines.
5 & 6 Vict. c. 55,
s. 12, App. 12.

Several provisions are to be found in the statutes with respect to the superintendence of railways, when constructed; and, first, if the railways of two or more companies have a common terminus, or a portion of the same line of rails in common, or which form separate portions of one continued line of railway communication, and they are not able to agree upon arrangements for conducting their joint traffic with safety to the public, the Board of Trade are authorized, upon the application of either of the parties, to decide the questions in dispute, so far as the same relate to the safety of the public, and to order and determine by whom the expenses attending on the arrangements shall be borne. So, where railway companies are bound by their acts of incorporation to make, at the expense of the owner or occupier of lands adjoining a railway, openings in the ledges or flanches thereof, for effecting communications with any collateral or branch railway, and any disagreement or difference arises between the company and such owner or occupier or other persons, as to the proper places for making such communication, then the Board of Trade are empowered to hear and determine the same, in such way as they shall think fit, and their determination is binding on all parties (f). And, although by the act of incorporation of any company, such disagreements as those above-mentioned are therein directed to be heard by justices of the peace, their jurisdiction is taken away. A clause in a subsequent statute, (which is not, as will be seen, applicable to all railways,)—after reciting that powers of laying down branch lines opening into the ledges or flanches of main lines of railway, and of passing along such main lines, with carriages and wagons drawn by locomotive engines, or by other mechanical or animal power, and also powers to form roads or railways across exist-period of postponement, the notice of opening given by the company should be withdrawn, and that a fresh ten days' notice be given as soon as the line is ready for re-inspection."

ing railways on a level, had been given by various acts relative to railways to the owners or occupiers of lands adjoining the railway, and to other persons with their consent,—enacts, that if, in the case of any railway on which passengers (g) are conveyed by steam and other mechanical power, it shall appear to the Board of Trade, that such power cannot be so exercised, without seriously endangering the public safety, and that an arrangement may be made, with a due regard to existing rights of property, the Board are authorized to order and direct that such power shall only be exercised subject to such conditions as they shall direct.

Superintendence of Railway Works.
5 & 6 Vict. c. 55,
s. 12, App. 12.

And in all cases where railways cross turnpike roads, highways, private roads, and tram-ways, on the level, and the railway company are willing at their own expense to carry such road and ways over or under their railway, by means of a bridge or arch, the Board of Trade are empowered, on the application of the company, and after hearing the parties interested, if it shall appear that the level crossing endangers the public safety, and that the proposal of the company does not violate existing rights or interests without adequate compensation, to give the company authority to build a bridge, or make such other arrangements as the nature of the case shall require.

Level crossings.
Sect. 13.

Where the company is authorized by the special act to carry the railway across a turnpike road or public carriage road on a level, it is provided by the Railways Clauses Act, 1863, for the greater convenience and security of the public, that the company shall erect a lodge and keep a proper person to watch at the point of crossing, and shall be subject to such regulations with regard to the crossing thereof on the level, or with regard to the speed at which trains may pass the level crossing, as may from time to time be made by the Board of Trade, under heavy penalties.

c. 92, s. 6, App.

Lodge at point of crossing.

The Board of Trade may also at any time, if it appears to them necessary for the public safety, require a bridge to be substituted for a level crossing (in which case a lodge, &c., at the point of crossing is dispensed with), and power is given to the company to take additional land for that purpose.

Board of Trade may require a bridge instead.
Sect. 7.

Sect. 8.

And, as we have seen (h), where a railway cuts off access between the land and a tidal water or tidal lands, the company are bound to make and maintain, free of toll to all persons at all times, such footways and carriage-ways under, over or across the railway, or on a level therewith, as the Board of Trade directs or approves.

The control of certain gates placed upon railways is also entrusted to the Board of Trade. On this subject it is necessary to state, that, before 5 & 6 Vict. c. 55, railway companies were, in certain cases, compelled, by their acts of incorporation, to keep gates constantly closed across their railways, for the purpose of protecting turnpike and other roads which crossed the railway on a level; but that statute directs, that, in all such cases, gates shall be kept closed across each end of the turnpike or other road, in lieu of across the railway; but it is provided, that the Board of Trade may, in any case in which they are satisfied that it would be more conducive for the public safety that the gates at any level crossing over any road should be kept closed across the railway, to order and direct that they should be kept so closed, instead of across the road. And by the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act similar powers, with regard to all gates across such roads, are given to the Board of Trade. And, by the same act, trains may not cross a turnpike road on a level, adjoining any station, at a greater speed than four miles an hour; and the company are made subject to all such rules and regulations, with regard to such crossings, as may from time to time be made by the Board of Trade. So, the Board may require the company to make a screen, or other works, on the side of roads adjoining a railway, to prevent horses from being frightened.

The Board of Trade are also armed with very extensive powers, which enable them, in certain specified cases, to authorize companies to take possession of lands adjoining to railways, which the special railway acts would not justify a trespass upon. These powers, extensive in their nature, are granted for purposes connected with the public safety; and it is provided, that the works shall be as little injurious to the lands as the nature of the case will admit of, and shall be executed with all possible despatch, and full compensation made to the owners and occupiers of such lands for the loss or injury or inconvenience sustained by them.

Thus, the Board of Trade may empower any railway company, in case of an accident or slip happening, or being apprehended, to any cutting, embankment, or other work, to enter upon any lands adjoining the railway, for the purpose of repairing or preventing the accident, and to do such works as may be necessary for the purpose; and, in cases of necessity, the company may enter and execute such works, without the previous sanction of the Board, the company taking care, within forty-eight hours after such an entry, to report the nature of the accident or apprehended accident, and the works necessary to be done, to the Board of Trade. But these powers cease, if the Board, after considering the report, certify that they are not necessary for the public safety; and it is further provided, that no land shall be taken permanently for such works, without a certificate from the Board of Trade.

So, in cases where the compulsory powers given by any railway act to a company, of purchasing and taking lands, have expired, then, if the Board of Trade shall certify that the public safety requires additional land to be taken by the company, "for the purpose of giving increased width to the embankments, and inclination to the slopes of railways, or for making approaches to bridges or archways, or for doing such works for the repair or prevention of accidents as are hereinbefore described," the compulsory powers of purchasing and taking land, which may be contained in the act of the company, revive, so far as regards the portions of land mentioned in the certificate (g).

IX. Authority of the Board of Trade to sanction Bye-laws.

The jurisdiction of the Board of Trade over bye-laws depends chiefly upon certain enactments contained in 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, which recites, that many companies were, or might thereafter be, authorized to make bye-laws, orders, rules or regulations, and to impose penalties upon persons other than the servants of the companies; and then enacts, that copies of all such bye-laws, &c., made before the passing of the act [10th August, 1840], certified as may from time to time be directed by the Board of Trade, shall, within two months after the passing of the act, be laid before them; and that every such bye-law, &c., not so laid before them, shall cease to have any force or effect.

3 & 4 Vict. c. 97.
Sect. 7, App. 8.

And, as to future bye-laws, it is further enacted, that no bye-law, &c., which should not be in force at the time of the passing of the act, and no order, rule or regulation annulling any existing bye-law, &c., which should be made after the passing thereof, shall have any force, until two months after a copy of such bye-law, &c., certified in like manner, shall have been laid before the Board, unless the Board shall before such period signify their approbation thereof.

By the Railways Clauses Act, 1863, bye-laws relating to passengers, animals and goods conveyed in steam vessels belonging to railway companies must also be sanctioned by the Board of Trade.

26 & 27 Vict.
c. 93, s. 32.

The Board are also authorized, at any time either before or after any bye-law, &c., laid before them shall have come into operation, to notify to the company their disallowance thereof, and, in certain cases, the time at which it shall cease to be in force; and no bye-law, &c., so disallowed has any force. The statute also repeals every enactment contained in any act of Parliament theretofore passed, which requires vided that, if the certificate shall, on such hearing, be refused, the party resisting the certificate may recover costs, if the Board of Trade shall require the company to pay them.

the approval or concurrence of any justice of the peace, court of quarter sessions, or other persons, other than members of the said companies, to give validity to their bye-laws.

Bye-laws as to servants.

It may be collected from the foregoing enactments (although they are not very clearly expressed), that the power to make bye-laws, upon persons other than officers and servants, is still preserved to railway companies, as it existed before the statute, subject, nevertheless, to the control of the Board of Trade. But it seems that the Board of Trade have no jurisdiction over bye-laws made for regulating the conduct of the servants of the company. And the Consolidation Acts do not appear to have altered the law in this respect, because the powers conferred on railway companies, by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 109 (post, App. 94), to make bye-laws for regulating the use of the railway, are given subject to the provisions of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97: whereas 8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, s. 124 (post, App. 39), which empowers them to make bye-laws for the regulation of officers and servants, and for providing for the due management of the affairs of the company, contains no reference to 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97.

Bye-laws for regulating travelling.

The Board of Trade have framed the following bye-laws for regulating travelling upon railways, which have been usually adopted.

1. No passenger will be allowed to enter any carriage used on the railway, or to travel therein upon the railway, without having first paid his fare and obtained a ticket. Each passenger, on payment of his fare, will be furnished with a ticket specifying the class of carriage and the distance for which the fare has been paid; which ticket such passenger is to show when required by the guard in charge of the train, and to deliver up before leaving the company's premises, upon demand, to the guard or other servant of the company, duly authorized to collect tickets. Any passenger not producing or delivering up his ticket as aforesaid will be required to pay the fare from the place whence the train originally started, and in default of payment thereof shall forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding 40s.

2. At the intermediate stations the fares will only be accepted, and the tickets furnished, conditionally; that is to say, in case there shall be room in the train for which the tickets are furnished; in case there shall not be room for all the passengers to whom tickets have been furnished, those to whom tickets have been furnished for the longest distance shall have the preference; and those to whom tickets have been furnished for the same distance shall have priority according to the order in which the tickets have been furnished, as denoted by the consecutive numbers stamped upon them.

3. Any person travelling without permission in a carriage of a superior class to that for which he has obtained a ticket is hereby subjected to a penalty not exceeding 40s.

4. Smoking tobacco is strictly prohibited, both in the carriages, and in the company's stations. Every person smoking tobacco in a carriage or station is hereby subjected to a penalty not exceeding 40s.; and every person persisting in smoking tobacco in a carriage or station, after being warned to desist by the guard in charge of the train, or any officer of the company, shall, in addition to incurring a penalty not exceeding 40s., be immediately, or, if travelling, at the first opportunity, removed from the company's premises.

5. Any person found in a carriage or station in a state of intoxication, or committing any nuisance, or otherwise wilfully interfering with the comfort of other passengers, is hereby subjected to a penalty not exceeding 40s., and shall immediately, or, if travelling, at the first opportunity, be removed from the company's premises.

6. Any passenger cutting the linings, removing or defacing the number-plates, breaking the windows, or otherwise wilfully damaging or injuring any carriage used on the railway, shall forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding 5*l.*, in addition to the amount of any damage for which he may be liable.

7. No passenger shall be permitted to ride on the roof, steps or platform of any carriage; and any person persisting in doing so, after being warned to desist by the guard in charge of the train, or any officer of the company, is hereby subjected to a penalty not exceeding 40s.

8. Any passenger entering or leaving, or attempting to enter or leave, any of the carriages while the train is in motion, is hereby subjected to a penalty not exceeding 40s.

9. Dogs will not be suffered to accompany passengers in the carriages, but will be conveyed separately and charged for.

NOTICES.

I. Under the provisions of the acts relating to this railway, any person who shall travel or attempt to travel in any carriage used on the railway, without having previously paid his fare, and with intent to avoid payment thereof, or who, having paid his fare for a certain distance, shall knowingly and wilfully proceed in any such carriage beyond such distance, without previously paying the additional fare for the additional distance, and with intent to avoid payment thereof, or who shall knowingly and wilfully refuse or neglect, on arriving at the point to which he has paid his fare, to quit such carriage, is for every such offence liable to a penalty of 40s.; and any person committing such offence may be lawfully apprehended and detained by the company's officers and servants, until he can be conveniently taken before some justice.

II. Persons wilfully obstructing or impeding the company's officers in the execution of their duty, are liable under 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, s. 16, to be apprehended and fined 5*l.*, with two months' imprisonment in default of payment.

III. No fee or gratuity is permitted to be taken by any guard, porter, or other servant of the company, under pain of immediate dismissal.

X. Authority of the Board of Trade to originate Prosecutions, and other Legal Proceedings.

The Board of Trade were originally authorized (h) to take certain steps to compel railway companies to comply with the provisions contained in their respective acts of Parliament; but a more extensive measure being declared to be expedient, that enactment was repealed, and the following authorities substituted, by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85.

provisions of that act, or of any general act relating to railways, have not been complied with by any railway company, or any of its officers, or that any railway company has acted or is acting in a manner unauthorized by the provisions of the acts of Parliament relating to such railway, or in excess of the powers given and objects defined in such acts, and it also appears to the Board that it would be for the public advantage that the company shall be restrained from so acting, the Board shall certify the same to the Attorney-General for England or Ireland, or to the Lord-Advocate for Scotland; and thereupon the Attorney-General or Lord-Advocate shall (i), in case such default shall consist of non-compliance with the provisions of any of the acts of Parliament before mentioned, proceed by information (k), or by action, bill, plaint, suit at law or in equity, or other legal proceeding, as the case may require, to recover penalties or forfeitures, or otherwise to enforce the due performance of the said provisions, by such means as any person aggrieved by such non-compliance, or otherwise authorized to sue for such penalties, might employ; and in case the default shall consist in the commission of some act unauthorized by law, then the proceeding shall be by suit in equity, or such other proceeding as the nature of the case may require, to obtain an injunction or order (which the judge in equity or other judge is authorized and required to grant, if he shall be of opinion that the acts of the company are not authorized by law) to restrain the company from acting in such illegal manner, or to give such other relief as the nature of the case may require. But it is provided, first, that no certificate shall be given until twenty-one days after the Board has given notice to the company of their intention to give such certificate; secondly, that no legal proceedings shall be commenced, under the above-mentioned authority, for any offence except upon any such certificate as aforesaid, and within one year after such offence has been committed (l).

XI. Authority of the Board of Trade to require certain Returns to be made.

Authority to require certain Returns.

The Board of Trade may direct every railway company to deliver returns (m) (according to the form provided by the Board) of the aggregate traffic in passengers, according to the several classes, and of the aggregate traffic in cattle and goods respectively, on the railway; also of all accidents which shall have occurred thereon, attended with personal injury; and also a table of all tolls, rates and charges, from time to time levied on each class of passengers, and on cattle and goods conveyed by the railway (n); and it is provided that such returns shall be required, in like manner and at the same time, from all the said companies, unless the Board shall specially exempt any of them, and enter the grounds of the exemption in the minutes of their proceedings; and every officer of any company, who wilfully makes any false return, is deemed guilty of a misdemeanor. A subsequent statute, without repealing the above-mentioned enactments as to the returns required to be made in cases of accident, further provides, that every railway company shall, within forty-eight hours after the occurrence upon their railway of any accident attended with serious personal injury to the public using the same, give notice thereof to the Board of Trade. The Board of Trade are also empowered to order and direct any railway company to make up and deliver to them returns of serious accidents occurring in the course of the public traffic upon the railway, whether attended with personal injury or not, in such form and manner as the Board of Trade shall deem necessary and require for their information, with a view to the public safety (o); but it is provided that all such returns shall be privileged communications, and shall not be evidence in any court whatsoever.

XII. Authority of the Board of Trade to regulate Third-Class Trains.

Certain railway companies are required to convey passengers by third-class trains, on payment of specified fares; and certain conditions, having relation to the rate of speed, the number of stoppages, and other particulars, are imposed by the statute (p). The Board of Trade have, however, a controlling power over these conditions:—First, the hour at which such trains start is subject to their approval;

(m) The returns made under this and the following enactments are stated in the yearly reports made by the Board of Trade.

(n) If such returns are not delivered within thirty days after they are required, the company are liable to pay to her Majesty 20*l.* for every day during which they wilfully neglect to deliver the same. 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, s. 3, post, App. 7.

(o) If these returns are not delivered within fourteen days after they have been required, a forfeiture of 5*l.* per day is incurred.

and, secondly, the carriages must be provided with seats, and be protected from the weather in a manner satisfactory to the Board (p). Moreover the Board have a discretionary power, upon the application of any railway company, to dispense with any of the required conditions, (except as to the amount of fare,) upon such terms as shall appear more beneficial and convenient for the passengers. Until the hours of arrival and departure are approved by the Board of Trade, the company cannot get any remission of duty in respect of cheap trains. When approved, a list is transmitted to the Board of Inland Revenue.

XIII. Authority of the Board of Trade to regulate the Speed of Mail Trains.

The obligations imposed on railway companies to transmit her Majesty's mails, are treated of elsewhere (q). An early statute required them to convey the mails by trains propelled at the maximum speed of their first-class trains (r), but, by a subsequent statute, the Postmaster-General is authorized to require that the mails shall be forwarded, by certain railways, at any rate of speed which the Inspector-General of Railways shall certify to be safe, not exceeding twenty-seven miles in the hour, including stoppages (s).

XIV. Authority of the Board of Trade to appoint Arbitrators and Umpires.

By "The Railway Companies Arbitration Act, 1859" (t), the Board of Trade may in certain cases appoint arbitrators and umpires.

(p) The Board of Trade require certain forms to be filled up in triplicate, relative to all cheap trains proposed to be run.

They also require to be furnished with a drawing of the carriages intended to be used for the conveyance of passengers by these trains, consisting of the three following figures, drawn to a scale of not less than four feet to an inch; viz.—

1stly. An outside elevation, showing the position of the windows, ventilators and lamps.

2ndly. A transverse section.

3rdly. An inside plan, showing the arrangements of the several seats, with reference by letters, specifying the width and length of each seat, and the number of passengers to be accommodated on each; also a memorandum of the size of the windows and ventilators, stating whether they are fixed or constructed to open and close, and the position of the lamps for lighting the carriages at night.

It is to be observed that the dimension of each carriage should be such as to allow twenty cubic feet of space at least to each passenger.

The area of the glass windows should afford to each passenger sixty superficial inches.

The seats must be provided with backs, and must be at least fifteen inches broad, and they must afford an average width of at least sixteen inches for each passenger.

Each carriage should be provided with two lamps at least to be lighted at night.

Should any alteration be at any time made in the hours of arrival or departure of the company's cheap trains, it is necessary that time tables, showing the intended changes, be previously submitted to the Board of Trade for their approval, in order to enable the company to obtain a remission of the duty.

(t) 22 & 23 Vict. c. 59, ss. 8, 10, 13, 15, post, App.

The Board of Trade are also authorized to appoint an umpire to determine certain matters referred to arbitration, under the provisions of the Consolidation Acts (u). This power applies to all cases where a railway company is one of the parties interested in the application; and the Board may be called upon to exercise their powers, if the arbitrators refuse or neglect for seven days to appoint an umpire. See the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, s. 131, post, App. 40; the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, s. 28, post, App. 50 (x); the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 129, post, App. 97.

Authority to extend Time.

Many of the Railway Acts passed in 1864 (y), relating to railways in the neighbourhood of London, require the companies to provide cheap trains for the labouring classes, and limit the liability of the companies in respect of accidents happening to passengers by such trains to 100l.; the amount of compensation payable in respect of any passenger so injured to be determined by an arbitrator to be appointed by the Board of Trade, and not otherwise.

Power to appoint arbitrators to determine compensation to labouring classes.

By the Companies Act, 1862, the Board of Trade may, in the case of companies, other than banking companies, that have a capital divided into shares, upon the application of members holding not less than one-fifth part of the whole shares, and in the case of companies not having a capital divided into shares, upon the application of members being in number not less than one-fifth of the whole number of registered members, appoint one or more inspectors to examine into the affairs of any company under that act, and to report thereon. But this power is not applicable to railway companies which have obtained acts of incorporation.

XV. Authority of the Board of Trade to extend the Period allowed for the Completion of a Railway, or for the compulsory taking of Lands, and to authorize the making of certain Contracts.

Certain powers were given to the Commissioners of Railways by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 3, to extend the period allowed by any Railway Act, either for the completion of the railway or works, or for the compulsory purchase of lands for that purpose, for such further time as the commissioners might think fit, not exceeding two years from the expiration of the period allowed by the particular Railway Act; but as this act required that the application should be made to the commissioners within two calendar months after the passing thereof, (i. e. 20th December, 1847,) it does not seem necessary to do more than refer generally to this statute. By the same act, railway companies who had not before 27th of November, 1847, executed or entered into a contract for the execution of any part of their works, could not enter into such contracts, unless in certain cases they were authorized to do so by an order of the Commissioners of Railways(a). Where the works were proceeded with by the authority of the shareholders, a certificate was required to be deposited in the office of the Commissioners of Railways(b).

XVI. Authority of the Board of Trade to authorize the Abandonment of Railways.

13 & 14 Vict. c. 83,
s. 1, App.

By the Abandonment of Railways Act, 1850, after reciting that companies had been incorporated by act of Parliament for making railways, and it had been found that such railways, or certain parts thereof, could not be made or carried on with advantage either to the promoters or to the public, and it was expedient that facilities should be given for the abandonment of such railways, it is enacted, that if any company authorized by act of Parliament theretofore passed (c) to make a railway, desire that the making and carrying on of such railway, whether commenced or not, be abandoned, such company may, with the consent of the holders of three-fifths of the shares of the company, make application to the Commissioners of Railways(d), setting forth the particulars of the railway or portion of the railway desired to be abandoned, and the grounds of such application. After providing for the mode of calling a meeting of the shareholders to obtain their consent to the abandonment, and of calling a second meeting, if the commissioners shall think it necessary, the act provides, that if it appear to the commissioners that there are sufficient grounds for entertaining such application, the commissioners shall require the company to give notice of such application by advertisement, setting forth therein how any person, who thinks himself aggrieved by the proposed abandonment, may bring such objection before the commissioners.

Authority to authorize Abandonment of Railways.

Upon proof that such notice had been duly given, the commissioners may, by warrant, authorize the abandonment of the railway or portion of railway.

Sect. 16.

Within one month after any warrant is granted, the company shall give notice, requiring all persons having any claims upon the company for compensation or otherwise to transmit the statement of such claims.

Sect. 17.

Upon proof that notice of such warrant has been duly published, the commissioners shall certify the same accordingly; and such certificate shall be evidence.

Sect. 18.

After the granting of such warrant the company shall (subject to the provisions thereafter contained) be released from all liability to make or work the railway, &c., or to purchase any of the lands, or to complete the purchase of any such lands, or to complete any contract which by reason of such abandonment cannot be performed.

Sect. 19.

But it is provided that the company shall not be released from certain specified contracts; and compensation must also be paid to certain parties, as in the act is directed.

Sects. 20—27.

The commissioners may also in certain cases authorize the company to remove bridges or tunnels, carried, for the purposes of the intended railway, across or under public or private roads, and thereby relieve the company from their liability to pay money for the purpose of keeping such bridges or tunnels in repair.

Sect. 22.

The act then provides that after the granting of any such warrant, the affairs of the company may be wound up in the manner therein directed (e). And lastly, the commissioners are required to lay before both Houses of Parliament a copy of every warrant, accompanied by a report.

The use and working of the railways or railway, or any part thereof, and the conveyance of traffic thereon ;

The fixing, collecting and apportionment of the tolls, rates, charges, receipts and revenues levied, taken or arising in respect of traffic.

Sect. 25.

The agreement shall not have any operation until it is approved by the Board of Trade, and the Board of Trade shall not approve the agreement without being satisfied of its having received the sanction of the shareholders in manner in the act particularly specified.

Sect. 27.

At the expiration of the first or any subsequent period of ten years after the making of the agreement, the Board of Trade may, if they are of opinion that the interests of the public are prejudicially affected thereby, cause the same to be revised ; and the Board of Trade may require the companies, parties thereto, to publish such notices of any intended revision of the agreement as the Board may direct, and may modify the agreement in such manner as may seem expedient for the protection of the interests of the public, and may declare the modification to be part of the agreement, and the same shall be read and take effect accordingly.

XVIII. Authority of the Board of Trade over Steam Vessels belonging to or used by Railway Companies.

26 & 27 Vict. c. 92,
Part IV., s. 30,
App.

By the Railways Clauses Act, 1863 (which, as we have seen (h), requires all bye-laws relating to steam vessels belonging to or used by railway companies to be sanctioned by the Board of Trade), where a railway company, incorporated either before or after the passing of that act, is authorized by a special act thereafter passed, and incorporating Part IV. of that act, to build, or buy, or hire, and to use, maintain and work, or to enter into arrangements for using, &c., steam vessels, for the purpose of carrying on a communication between any towns or ports, and to take tolls in respect of such steam vessels ; then, in every seventh year after the passing of the special act, reckoned from the 1st day of January next after its passing, the Board of Trade, if they are of opinion that the interests of the public are prejudicially affected by the exercise of the powers of the com-

And if the company does not before the beginning of the then next Session of Parliament make provision to the satisfaction of the Board of Trade, for the protection of the interests of the public, or if the injury done to the interests of the public is in the opinion of the Board of Trade incapable of being remedied by the company, then the Board of Trade, at the beginning of the Session of Parliament then next following, shall report to both Houses of Parliament such their opinion, and the reasons on which that opinion is founded; and at the expiration of twelve calendar months after the presentation to the Houses of Parliament of that report, the powers of the company relative to steam vessels, or such of them as are specified in the report, shall, unless Parliament in the meantime otherwise provides, cease to be exercised.

The statutes contain provisions which direct the mode in which all documents issuing from the Board of Trade are to be signed; and, also, what shall be deemed a sufficient service of them upon railway companies (i). And the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act also enacts upon this subject, "that all regulations, certificates, notices and other documents in writing, purporting to be made or issued by or by the authority of the Board of Trade, and signed by some officer appointed for that purpose by the Board of Trade, shall, for the purposes of this and the special act, and any act incorporated therewith, be deemed to have been so made and issued, and that without proof of the authority of the person signing the same, or of the signature thereto, which matters shall be presumed until the contrary be proved; and service of any such document, by leaving the same at one of the principal offices of the railway company, or by sending the same, by post, addressed to the secretary at such office, shall be deemed good service upon the company; and all notices and other documents, required by this or the special act to be given to or laid before the Board of Trade, shall be delivered at, or sent by post addressed to, the office of the Board of Trade in London.

I. Traffic Regulations contained in 17 & 18 Vict. c. 31, and other statutory Provisions relating to Traffic.

THE Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854 (a), after reciting that it is expedient to make better provision for regulating the traffic on railways and canals, enacts by sect. 2 as follows:—

“Every railway company, canal company, and railway and canal company, shall, according to their respective powers, afford all reasonable facilities for the receiving and forwarding and delivering of traffic (b) upon and from the several railways and canals belonging to or worked by such companies respectively, and for the return of carriages, trucks, boats and other vehicles, and no such company shall make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to or in favour of any particular person or company, or any particular description of traffic, in any respect whatsoever; nor shall any such company subject any particular person or company, or any particular description of traffic, to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever; and every railway company and canal company and railway and canal company having or working railways or canals which form part of a continuous line of railway or canal, or conveyed by any railway company or canal company, or railway and canal company, but also carriages, waggons, trucks, boats, and vehicles of every description adapted for running or passing on the railway or canal of any such company.

By sect. 3, "It shall be lawful for any company or person complaining against any such companies or company of anything done, or of any omission made in violation or contravention of this act, to apply in a summary way, by motion or summons in England, to her Majesty's Court of Common Pleas at Westminster, or in Ireland to any of her Majesty's Superior Courts in Dublin, or in Scotland to the Court of Session in Scotland, as the case may be, or to any judge of any such court; and upon the certificate to her Majesty's Attorney-General in England or Ireland, or her Majesty's Lord Advocate in Scotland, of the Board of Trade, alleging any such violation or contravention of this act by any such companies or company, it shall also be lawful for the said Attorney-General or Lord Advocate to apply in like manner to any such court or judge, and in either of such cases it shall be lawful for such court or judge to hear and determine the matter of such complaint; and for that purpose, if such court or judge shall think fit, to direct and prosecute, in such mode and by such engineers, barristers, or other persons as they shall think proper, all such inquiries as may be deemed necessary to enable such court or judge to form a just judgment on the matter of such complaint; and if it be made to appear to such court or judge on such hearing, or on the report of any such person, that anything has been done or omission made in violation or contravention of this act by such company or companies, it shall be lawful for such court or judge to issue a writ of injunction or interdict, restraining such company or companies from further continuing such violation or contravention of this act, and enjoining obedience to the same, and in case of disobedience of any such writ of injunction or interdict, it shall be lawful for such court or judge to order that a writ or writs of attachment, or any other process of such court incident or applicable to writs of injunction or interdict (d), shall issue against any one or more of the directors of any company, or against any owner, lessee, contractor or other person failing to obey such writ of injunction or interdict; and such court or judge may also, if they or he shall think fit, make an order directing the payment by one or more of such companies of such sum of money as such court or judge shall determine, not exceeding for each company the sum of two hundred pounds for every day, after a day to be named in the order, that such company or companies shall fail to obey such injunction or interdict, and such monies shall be payable as the court or judge may direct, either to the party complaining or into court to abide the ultimate decision of the court, or to her Majesty, and payment thereof may, without prejudice to any other mode of recovering the same, be enforced by attachment or order in the nature of a writ of execution, in like manner as if the same had been recovered by a decree or judgment in any superior court at Westminster or Dublin, in England or Ireland, and in Scotland by such diligence as is competent

Sect. 4.

Rehearing.

(e) The following Rules have been issued by the Court of Common Pleas (15 C. B. 472).

1. Every application made under this act to the court shall be for a rule calling upon the company or companies complained of, to show cause why a writ of injunction should not issue against such company or companies, enjoining them to do, or to desist from doing, the thing required to be done, or the thing, the doing of which is complained of by the company or person making such application; and every application made under this act to a judge at chambers shall be by summons calling upon the company or companies complained of to show cause in like manner, which summons shall be granted only upon affidavit, and upon a statement made to the judge in like manner as upon an application to the court for a rule to show cause.

2. If on the hearing of any such rule or summons, the court or judge shall think fit to direct and prosecute inquiries into the matter thereof, under the 3rd section of this act, the order for that purpose shall be in the following terms, or to the like effect; the rule or summons being enlarged until such further day as the court or judge shall think fit, in order that in the meantime such inquiries may be made and reported on:—
"IN THE COMMON PLEAS.

"In the matter of the complaint of A. B. [or 'of the — company'] against the — company.

"It is ordered, that C. D., Esq., engineer [or as the case may be] do forthwith make such inquiries into the matter of this complaint as may be necessary to enable the court [or 'the Honorable Mr. Justice —'] to determine the same, and do report thereon to the court [or 'to the said Mr. Justice —'] on or before the — day of — next.

"Dated this — day of —, 186-."

3. Office copies of all the affidavits filed by either party on the hearing of such rule or summons shall, at the expense of such party, be furnished to the person appointed to make such inquiries, within three days after the making of such order as aforesaid.

4. The parties shall be entitled to be again heard by the court or judge upon the said report, but no fresh affidavits shall be allowed on such hearing, unless by leave of the court or a judge.

5. Every writ of injunction issued under this act shall be in the following form, or to the like effect:—

"Victoria, &c. To the — company, their agents and servants, and every of them, greeting: Whereas A. B. "Witness, Sir Wm. Erle at Westminster, the — day of — in the year of our Lord —."

6. If the court or judge shall think fit also to make an order, directing the payment of a sum of money by the company or companies complained of, such order shall be in the following form, or to the like effect:—

"IN THE COMMON PLEAS.

upon the application of any party aggrieved by the order made upon such motion or summons as aforesaid, it shall be lawful for the court or judge by whom such order was made, to direct, if they think fit so to do, such motion or application on summons to be reheard before such court or judge, and upon such rehearing to rescind or vary such order; and it is also enacted, that no proceeding shall be taken for any violation or contravention of the above enactments, except in the manner therein provided; but nothing therein contained shall take away or diminish any rights, remedies or privileges of any person or company against any railway or canal, or railway and canal company, under the existing law (e).

Soon after the passing of this act, it was held by the Court of Common Pleas, that in order to induce that court to interfere under sect. 2, it is not necessary to show a case of individual grievance, but it is quite clear that a case must be made out of public inconvenience. Where, therefore, it appeared clearly by the affidavits made on behalf of the company, that no public complaint of want of accommodation had ever been made, and it did not appear upon the complainant's affidavits that any such complaint had ever been made, the court discharged with costs a rule which had been obtained for the purpose of compelling the company to run trains at particular times (f). And in another case, which happened shortly afterwards (g), the court held that in determining whether a railway company has given "any undue and unreasonable preference" to a particular person, company or traffic, or subjected a particular person, company or traffic, to "undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage," the court may take into consideration the fair interests of the railway itself, and entertain such questions as whether the company might not carry larger quantities or for longer distances at lower rates per ton per mile, than smaller quantities or for shorter distances, so as to into court, to abide the ultimate decision of the court, the same shall, upon the ultimate decision of the court being made, be paid out of court either to the party complaining, or to the use of her Majesty, or to the company by which the same was paid into court, as the court or judge shall direct.

(e) The last clause of this act, sect. 7, applies to the obligations of companies, as common carriers, and will be found in the chapter on that subject, post, Part II., s. ii.

(f) Barret v. Great Northern R. Co., 26 L. J. (C. P.) 83; 1 C. B. (N. S.) 423. However, in Attorney-General v. Same, 29 L. J. (Ch.) 801, Kindersley, V. C., said, "It is clear that the grievance which this act was intended to prevent was where a certain individual was suffering detriment, by reason of the company not acting impartially between that individual and some other person, or it might happen between two companies. But it must be a case of private mischief, arising from partiality on the part of the railway, with respect to the carriage of the goods of those individuals. It does not apply to the case where the public (that is, the Attorney-General on behalf of the public) is complaining, not that you are carrying A's goods in preference to B's goods, but that there is a general detriment not to any particular individual—not even to coal owners in particular—but a detriment to the public, who are consumers of the coal. That is the complaint, and this act does not appear to me to touch that question in the smallest degree.

derive equal profits to itself. But, as in that case it was manifest from the affidavits, that the company charged R., a coal merchant, at Ipswich, who sent from thence coal, which had come by sea, a higher rate for the carriage of his coal over the companies' lines than they charged P., who had made agreements with them to carry large quantities from Peterborough over their lines, and that the sums charged to P. were fixed so as to enable him to compete with R., the court granted an injunction enjoining the company to desist from giving any undue preference to P., and to carry coal for R. on equal terms with P., due regard being had to the circumstances, if any, which rendered the cost to the company less in carrying for the one than for the other. And in a case (h) in which it appeared that the N. E. R. Co., from a desire to introduce northern coke into Staffordshire, were induced to make special agreements with different merchants for the carriage of coal and coke, at a rate lower than their ordinary charge, it was held that this was not a legitimate ground for making such agreements, and that lowering their rate for that purpose, there being nothing to show that the pecuniary interests of the company were affected, was giving an undue preference to that traffic. But the court refused in that case to require the company to provide trucks for the carriage of coal and coke, for a merchant who refused to pay demurrage for them, at the same rate as was charged to all other merchants under similar circumstances.

It is not a sufficient ground for the interference of the court, that a railway company charge higher fares for distances on one branch line than they charge for equal distances on another, if all persons travelling on one branch are charged the same; nor that they issue third-class return tickets on one branch line and not on another; nor will the court interfere with the arrangements of a railway company respecting the number of trains that stop or the times at which they stop at any particular station, unless it be distinctly shown that such

*Harris v. Cocker-

A railway company (n) being threatened by the owner of extensive collieries, which he had at considerable expense connected with their line, that unless they agreed to carry his coals to W., the terminus of their line, at a certain rate, he would construct a tramway from his collieries to W., and so divert his coal traffic from their line altogether, entered into an agreement with him accordingly, under which they carried his coals at such rate, being a less rate than they charged the proprietors of other collieries situate in the same district for the carriage of their coals over the same portion of the line, it was held that this was an undue preference within the meaning of the act, and the court granted an injunction. Cockburn, C. J., saying:—

“I quite agree that this court has intimated, if not absolutely decided, that a company is entitled to take into consideration any circumstances, either of a general or of a local and peculiar character, in considering the rate of charge which they will impose upon any particular traffic. As for instance, if a company were to lay down a rule, that if a certain large quantity of goods were brought to be conveyed, they could charge less for the conveyance of that large quantity, than they would for the conveyance of a less quantity, regard being had to the cost of working the particular line; that would be a very fair ground to justify them in making a distinction between the case of a person who sent a ton of goods at a time, and a person who sent only a hundred weight. So also, if a company were to make a distinction between terminal traffic and intermediate traffic, there might be very fair and sufficient reasons for their so doing. As for instance, in respect of terminal traffic there might be competition with another railway, and in respect of terminal traffic as distinguished from intermediate traffic it might well be they could afford to carry goods over the whole line cheaper, or proportionably so, than they could over an intermediate part of the line. But in all such cases the general public would be treated with perfect equality, although, as regards the charges between one place and another, there might be an apparent, though, for the reasons I have referred to, no real injustice. But those cases are very different from the present. Here, there are collieries situate in the same locality, and a distinction is made between them upon the ground that L. or his tenants would send their coals by some other conveyance, either by the ordinary mode, or by some railway which L. would be induced to construct if the company did not give him this advantage over others who are competing with him in the sale of coals. In my opinion, that is not a sufficient ground for making the distinction. Whatever rule the company may lay down, it ought to be a rule applicable to all persons similarly circumstanced. I do not think that this is such a rule. It is plain, that if we were to take into consideration the circumstances upon which counsel relied, there is no case in which we should not be called on to enter into a consideration of the various circumstances, which may influence one person as distinguished from another in sending his goods by a particular railway. Circumstances differ in every individual case, and it might always be a question of how far the company would be justified in making particular bargains. I do not think it was the intention of the legislature, or its policy, when railways were constituted, that they should have the power of making bargains with particular individuals, so as to give them advantages and subject others to corresponding disadvantages. The intention of the legislature was, I think, to give equal advantages, so far as the rate of charge is concerned, to all individuals similarly circumstanced; and that a railway company, although they should have a right to lay down certain rules in reference to particular circumstances, provided they act bonâ fide with regard to their own interests and the interests of the public, should not be at liberty to make particular bargains with particular individuals, whereby one person is benefited and another injured."

Harris v. Cocker-mouth and Workington R. Co.

Where a railway company adjusted certain districts within which they carried coals at reduced rates, for quantities not less than a train load, 200 tons, and those districts were so adjusted that the places where the complainants (who were coal dealers at I.) dealt, instead of being put into one district, were distributed into three, so that it was necessary for them, in order to take advantage of the reduced rates, to send three train loads from I. into each district, which was more than their traffic demanded, whereas, for dealers sending coals from P., a single district was constituted, comprising, besides other places, those at which the complainants dealt, and so afforded a traffic requiring coals enough to enable the P. dealers to take advantage of the lower rates; the court refused to interfere, as it was not shown that the complainants were unduly subjected to this disadvantage, or that it was caused by undue preference, the adjustment of districts not being disadvantageous to the public at large or objectionable in other respects (o). But as the company made a scale of charges for the

(o) Ransome v. Eastern Counties R. Co., 27 L. J. (C. P.) 166; 4 C. B. (N. S.) 135. The company afterwards charged the reduced rates for the carriage of coals consigned by dealers at P., in the prescribed quantities of thirty-five trucks for one of such districts, though not carried by the company in one train all the way, the company, for their own convenience in consequence of steep gradients, which would otherwise have required extra steam power, detaching at C. some of the trucks from the train, and sending them on afterwards by the ordinary goods or other trains to which they might be advantageously attached. None of the coals were ever left at C. for consumption there, but were all carried to the district to which they had been so consigned. It was held that by so doing the company had not given an undue preference to the consignors at P., since the tariff being valid, it was immaterial how the company carried coals most conveniently to themselves, provided the tariff was not infringed. *Same v. carriage of coals from P. and from I., to places on their line at which the complainants dealt, the effect of which was to diminish the natural advantages which the position of the dealers at I., by reason of its greater proximity to those places, gave them over the dealers at P., by annihilating in point of expense of carriage a portion of the distance between P. and those places, it was held that an undue preference was thereby given to the dealers at P. (p).

A railway company which had been in the habit of unloading goods conveyed by them on their railway, by taking them out of the trucks and placing them in or adjacent to the waggons of the consignees, established a new system, under which they declined to allow their servants to unload C.'s goods from their trucks without extra pay. They, however, continued to unload P.'s goods, as these, from the smallness of their quantity, were not carried, like C.'s in separate trucks, but were mixed with the company's own traffic, and it was therefore for the convenience of the company that they unloaded them from the trucks; the court refused to grant an injunction enjoining the company to unload the trucks containing C.'s goods, and to deliver such goods to C., by placing the same in or adjacent to his waggons. But they intimated an opinion, that if C. had previously complained to the company of their giving an advantage to P. over him in so unloading P.'s goods, and the company had not afterwards removed such ground of complaint, the court would have interfered to prevent the continuance of such undue advantage, although the rule nisi for an injunction was not framed for such a case (q).

Where a preference was given by a railway company to a customer, who engaged to employ other lines of the company, distinct from and unconnected with that in respect of which such preference was granted, it was held to be an undue preference (r).

A railway company formerly charged a uniform rate of 3s. 6d. per ton on all goods conveyed on their line between R. and P. The goods were collected and delivered both by the company and B. at 4s. 10d. per ton. The company, who had power under their acts to impose their own rates of charge for carrying, but no power to impose tolls for collecting and delivering, raised the charge for carrying to 8s. 4d., being the aggregate of the above two charges, with an intimation to the public that they would collect and deliver goods free of all charge. The real purpose of this arrangement was to compel persons, desiring to have their goods conveyed by the railway, to employ the company to collect and deliver such goods, and thus to secure this business and the profits upon it to the company, as well as to exclude B. from competing with them in this department of business. It was held, that this arrangement was an undue preference to the company in their separate capacity of carriers other than on the line of railway and also an undue prejudice to B. (s). In giving judgment in that case, Cockburn, C. J., said:—

Canal Traffic Act,
1854.*

*Baxendale v.
Great Western
R. Co. (Reading

“The main stand made by the counsel for the company was on the ground, first, that, although the legislature has imposed on railway companies the obligation of affording accommodation on equal terms to the public, it cannot have been the intention to deprive them of the right possessed by all trading companies as well as by individuals of using their property and managing their affairs, within the scope of the purposes for which they are constituted, in such manner as they think most to their advantage; and, secondly, that in the present instance the company had, by act of Parliament, the power of raising their tolls at their own will and pleasure, provided they raise them equally as against all persons; that here they have raised them equally against all, and that it was not within the authority of this court to fix limits to the amount of accommodation which the company might think proper to afford gratuitously, beyond the conveyance by the railway for which the toll was charged. We think there is little difficulty in disposing of this argument. It is abundantly clear from the statutory enactments, which enjoin on railway companies the obligation to afford accommodation on equal and reasonable terms, and from the provisions of the statute by which jurisdiction is given to this court against the affording of undue preference, or the imposing of undue prejudice or disadvantage, that it was not the intention of the legislature to leave to railway companies the unfettered exercise of their rights as proprietors of their respective lines; but in return for the great power which it has conceded to them, and the monopoly of the carrying business of the country, which in a great degree they have been enabled to acquire, it has imposed upon them the obligation of affording accommodation on equal terms to the whole of the public. The policy and justice of such a requirement are manifest, it being obvious that the powers of a railway company, and its monopoly, under the impossibility of all competition, might otherwise be converted into a means of very grievous oppression by a difference in point of charge, or in point of accommodation made in favour of one man at the expense of another, or by disadvantages in respect either of charge or accommodation imposed on one as compared with another. And it is plain, that the oppressive effects of such inequality will be equally great, whether its motive and operation be to benefit third parties, or the railway company itself. Such being plainly the intention of the legislature, and this court having been constituted the tribunal by which any injustice or inequality of the working of the railway system, as between the companies and the public, are to be redressed; we must endeavour to prevent any injustice either in the rate of charge or the degree of accommodation afforded. At the same time we must carefully avoid interfering, except where absolutely necessary for the above purpose, with the ordinary rights which (subject to the before-named qualification) a railway company in common with every other company or individual possesses, of regulating and managing its own affairs, either with regard to charges or accommodation, or to the agreements and bargains it may make in its particular business. Greater difficulty, no doubt, arises in dealing with cases in which the purpose and effect of the matter to be considered, although it may incidentally have the effect of prejudicing third parties, is in reality to benefit the company itself, than in those in which the immediate object is to give an undue advantage for the benefit of a third party. Yet we think, that no serious difficulty will be found in ascertaining the principles on which the authority of the court should be exercised. It may be convenient, in the first place, to advert to a distinction, not always kept sight of in argument, between cases in which the interests of the company sought to be promoted by the regulation or act complained of, is one which arises with reference to the railway itself as to which the question occurs, and those in which the benefit sought to be obtained by the company is one which has reference to interests distinct from those of the particular railway, as where, for example, the company are the proprietors of another railway, or carry on some other business. In the latter class of cases, it appears to us clear that the company must be taken to be, quoad the particular railway, in the position of third parties, and that they cannot, with a view to such separate interests, give an undue preference or impose an unreasonable disadvantage, any more than they could do so to promote the interests of any other party. Thus, if a railway company being promoters of one line from A. to B., and of another line from C. to D., were, in order to obtain the custom of a particular individual on the first of those lines, on which they might be subject to competition from a rival line, to agree to convey his goods on the line from C. to D. at a cheaper rate than those of another person using only the latter line; or if a railway company carrying on, in addition to its business as carriers on the line, that of carriers to and from the termini of the railway, were, with a view to obtain additional custom in the latter, to carry on the railway for those who employed them as carriers to and from the railway at a lower rate than those who did not; in both these cases we should have no difficulty in holding that the company must be considered, as regards those separate interests, in the light of third parties, and that they cannot promote those interests at the expense of the right of the public to that equality on the particular railway which it was the intention of the act of Parliament to secure. Greater difficulty and nicety arise in dealing with cases in which the purpose and effect of the thing complained of is the benefit of the company in their character of proprietors of a particular railway. In these cases, the court might feel greater reluctance to interpose, partly from an unwillingness to interfere with the parties in the management of their own affairs for their own advantage, partly from a disposition to give companies credit for acting on an enlightened view of their own interests as identified with those of the public; yet if the court became clearly satisfied that the company were seeking to promote its own advantage by establishing an inequality which was unreasonable under the circumstances and operated unfairly and injuriously on particular individuals, or that it was affording to one person or set of persons an advantage which it would not afford to another under similar circumstances, this court would not hesitate to interfere to prevent such a result, although by so doing they might prevent the company from securing all the profit that it might otherwise derive from the use of its property. Thus, were a complaint made that a railway company, as between two intermediate stations, charged a higher rate than was due to the intermediate space, in proportion to the charge made on the entire line of railway; this court, if it were made to appear that the disproportion was not justified by the circumstances of the traffic,—in other words, was an undue prejudice or unreasonable disadvantage to those using the part of the railway in question,—would interfere to set aside such arrangement (t). So, again, if an arrangement were made by a railway company, whereby persons bringing a larger amount of traffic to the railway should have their goods carried on more favourable terms than those bringing a less quantity, although the court might uphold such an arrangement as an ordinary incident of commercial economy, provided the same advantages were extended to all persons under the like circumstances; yet it would assuredly insist on the latter condition, and would interfere in the case of any special agreement by which the company had secured to a particular individual the benefit of such an agreement to the exclusion of others, or even where an attempt had been made, by keeping the agreement secret, to make it operate unduly to the prejudice of third parties. This reasoning appears to us effectually to dispose of the argument that the court cannot interfere to prevent a railway company from fixing the rate of tolls to be taken on its railway, in such manner as shall best promote its own interests, in cases where, by so doing, the company subjects others to unreasonable disadvantage, or operates to their prejudice by giving undue preference to third parties. We proceed to consider the second ground taken by the defendants, which is in substance, that having power to raise their rates of charge for carrying on their line, and having done so equally as regards all, they do not come within the statutory prohibition against undue preference or undue prejudice, by affording other accommodation in addition to that of carrying on their line. We think this argument rests on two obvious fallacies: that of supposing the charge in question is one made by the company, in reference to their character and interest with respect to the railway; whereas in reality the charge is made by them in a character and interest independent of the railway, namely, as carriers to and from the termini of the railway; and secondly, that the company can convert that which is in reality a charge for collecting and delivering, as well as for carrying, into one for carrying only, by affixing to it the latter denomination in their table of fares. It is true, no doubt, that the company's acts give them power to impose their own rates of charge for the carriage of this description of traffic; but these acts give them no power to impose tolls or charges for collecting and delivering, and it is palpably an abuse of their powers, if, under the name of a charge for carrying on their line, they impose, otherwise than with the assent of the parties concerned, a charge for a totally different thing; and again, although the legislature has conferred the power of imposing rates and charges, it has annexed to this power the obligation of imposing such rates equally, and the company cannot be permitted to evade this obligation by colourably pretending that that is a charge for carriage only, which is in fact a charge for other things as well as for carriage. The court is bound to look at the transaction in its true light, and cannot suffer itself to be diverted from its duty of interfering to prevent what in effect is such an injustice, as it was the purpose of the legislature to prevent, because the transaction is attempted to be covered over by a transparent disguise. Looking then at the alteration in the tolls, in its true light, we are of opinion that the arrangement is objectionable both as an undue preference given on the one hand, and as an unreasonable disadvantage imposed on the other. It is an undue preference to the company in their separate capacity of carriers other than on the line of railway, inasmuch as they thereby practically secure to themselves the entire monopoly of the last-mentioned traffic, to the entire exclusion of the complainants and all others. It is an undue prejudice, and an unreasonable disadvantage imposed on the complainants, inasmuch as it is plain that their goods and those of all persons employing them, as indeed the goods of all persons other than those who employ the company to collect and deliver, must be subjected, as compared with the goods of the latter twice over, to the expense attendant on collecting and delivering, if they employ others to collect and deliver for them, or to an unnecessary charge if they require no such accommodation."

Garton v. Bristol and Exeter R. Co.

Similar principles were acted on in the following case (u). A railway company refused to receive goods sent to their station by the public generally after a quarter past five o'clock p.m., to be forwarded by the goods train, which left such station on the same night, but they received goods for the same train brought there by their agent W., as late as eight o'clock p.m. W. had a receiving office for goods about a mile from the station, where he weighed, classified and prepared the goods for loading, which must otherwise have been done at the station, and but for which having been so previously done, the goods could not generally have been received at the station at so late an hour. On the goods so received at his office, W. made a charge for conveying them to the station, in addition to the company's usual rates of charge for carriage upon the railway. It was held that the facility so given to W. for forwarding goods after the station was closed to others, was an undue prejudice to those who did not wish to have their goods conveyed to the station for them. And in the same case it was also held, that a preference with respect to a reduced rate of carriage of certain goods given by a railway company to certain individuals, in consideration of their contracting to have all such goods consigned to them through the railway and not by water or other means, is an undue preference, unless it be clearly shown that it is done in order to prevent a competition with the railway, or that there is secured thereby to the company such an amount of traffic as to compensate for making the reduced rate (x).

Some other regulations affecting traffic must now be noticed.

The gauge on which railways for the conveyance of passengers must be constructed has been already mentioned (a). Gauge of railways.

With respect to the statutory provisions relating to the engines and carriages which may be used and brought upon railways, they seem to show that it was in the contemplation of the Legislature to treat a railway as a common highway, open alike to all persons who may choose to put carriages thereon (b). The Railways Clauses Consolidation Act enacts, on this subject, that, on payment of the tolls demandable, all companies and persons shall be entitled to use the railway, with engines and carriages properly constructed, subject to 5 & 6 Vict. c. 55, and to the regulations made by the company (c). Regulations as to engines and carriages to be used on railways.
8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 92, App. 92.

And, with respect to the engines and carriages to be brought on the railway, it is enacted, that every locomotive steam-engine must be constructed on the principle of consuming its own smoke, otherwise the party using it is liable to a penalty (d). No engine may be brought on the rails, unless first approved of by the company; and, on receiving notice, the company are required to send their agent to examine the engine, and to report thereon; and within seven days after the report, if the engine be proper to be used, the company must give a certificate of their approval. If an engine is out of repair, or unfit to be used, the company may forbid its use until it has been repaired; and, in case of a difference of opinion as to the fitness of an engine or carriage, the same is to be settled by arbitration. If improper engines or carriages are brought upon the railway, or used, a penalty is incurred (e). No carriage may be upon the railway (except in directly crossing the same) unless it be of the construction, and in the condition which the regulations of the company Sect. 114.

require (f). All regulations made by the company respecting carriages must be in writing under their common seal, and must be applicable alike to the carriages of the company, and to the carriages of other persons using the railway; and a copy of such regulations may be demanded by all persons. The owners of carriages using the railway must enter their names, and the number, weights, and gauges of their carriages, and also paint the same particulars on the carriages, if required so to do; and the carriages may be measured, &c. at the expense of the company; on default, the company may remove the carriage. If the carriage of any person using the railway be improperly loaded, or suffered to obstruct the railway, it may be unloaded or removed, and all expenses must be paid by the owner; and the company are not liable for any damage or loss occasioned by unloading or removing a carriage or goods, except for their wilful or negligent acts, or any wrongful detainer. The owners of engines and carriages on the railway are answerable for any trespass or damage done by them or their servants, and servants may be convicted before two justices; and the owner may recover any money paid by him from his servant, in the manner prescribed.

II. Obligation to convey Her Majesty's Mails (g).

Obligation to convey her Majesty's mails.

The obligations imposed on railway companies to convey the mails are contained in 1 & 2 Vict. c. 98 (h), 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85, s. 11 (i), and 10 & 11 Vict. c. 85, s. 16 (k); and by a clause always inserted in each special railway act, the company are made liable to the provisions of these general acts.

The above-mentioned general acts are applicable to railways, whether the carriages used are impelled by steam, locomotive or stationary engines, or animal or other power (l); and no company can make bye-laws repugnant to these acts (m).

The Postmaster-General is authorized, by notice delivered to any railway company (n), to require that the mails shall be forwarded on the railway, either by the ordinary or special trains, at such hours or times in the day or night as the Postmaster-General shall direct,

And it is provided, that the rate of speed to be required shall in no case exceed the maximum rate of speed prescribed by the directors for the conveyance of passengers by the first-class trains; but that no alteration in the rate of speed of any train by which the mails are conveyed shall be made, until six months' previous notice be given to the Postmaster-General, of any such intended alteration (p). The subsequent statute, 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85, amended the law with respect to certain railways, as to the rate of speed (q).

The Postmaster-General may also require that the whole of the inside of any carriage shall be exclusively appointed for the purpose of carrying the mail (r); and that separate carriages be provided for the purpose of sorting letters (s); also, that mail coaches or carts shall be conveyed on the trucks or frames used on the railway (t), or that a mail-guard shall be conveyed, with bags of a specified weight, by any trains other than a mail train, upon the same conditions as any other passengers (u). And the officers, servants, and agents of a railway company engaged in carrying the mails are required to obey, observe and perform all such reasonable regulations respecting the conveyance, delivering, and leaving of mails and post letter-bags, guards and officers of the Post-Office, mail coaches, or carts and carriages on the railway, or on the line thereof, as the Postmaster-General, or such officer of the Post-Office as he shall nominate, shall, in his discretion, from time to time give or make. But it is provided, that no such officer shall interfere with, or give orders to the engineer having the charge of any engine used upon the railway, and that any cause of complaint shall be stated to the conductor, or other officer having charge of the train, or to the chief officer at any station (x). And the Postmaster-General may require, in the manner prescribed by the before-mentioned act, 1 & 2 Vict. c. 98, that any mails and post letter-bags shall be conveyed and forwarded by any railway company on their railway, under and pursuant to the said act, notwithstanding any guard or other officer of the Post-Office shall not be sent with the same or in charge thereof (y). The term railway used in the last-mentioned act and in the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 98, shall include every railway then constructed, or thereafter to be constructed under the powers of any act of Parliament; and wherever the term railway company or company of proprietors is used in either of the said acts, it shall be construed to extend to include the proprietors for the time being of any such last-mentioned railway, and any lessees or tenants thereof (z). If the company or their servants refuse or neglect to perform any of the duties imposed upon them by 1 & 2 Vict. c. 98, the company are liable to forfeit 20*l.* for every offence (a), irrespective of their liability under the bond, which the Postmaster-General may, if he shall think fit, require any railway company to enter into. The form of this bond, and the sum in which it is taken, is in the discretion of the Postmaster-General, and it must be renewed from time to time whenever it becomes forfeited, or when the Postmaster-General shall require it to be renewed (b). The condition of the bond requires the company to perform all acts, matters and things which are by 1 & 2 Vict. c. 98, required to be done or performed by the company, their officers, servants and agents (c). With respect to railways, or parts of railways, demised by the company of proprietors before the passing of the act 1 & 2 Vict. c. 98, the lessees, and their assigns, during the continuance of such lease, are liable to perform all the above-mentioned duties, in lieu of the company of proprietors, except that such lessees (not being a body corporate or company), or Obligation to convey her Majesty's Mails.

The remuneration to be received by railway companies for the performance of the foregoing services is ascertained in the following manner:—First, it is provided, that the railway company shall be entitled to receive such reasonable remuneration as shall (either prior to or after the commencement of the services) be fixed and agreed on between the Postmaster-General and the company (e); or, in case of difference, then such remuneration as shall be determined by two arbitrators, one to be named by each party; and if such arbitrators cannot agree, then the amount is to be ascertained by an umpire, appointed by the arbitrators previously to their entering upon the inquiry (f). The arbitrators are to be appointed by each party within fourteen days after notice from the other, or, in default of such appointment, the arbitrator of the party giving notice may name the other arbitrator; and the arbitrators are required to make their award twenty-eight days after their appointment, or otherwise the matter shall be left to be determined by the umpire. If the umpire neglects or refuses to make his award for twenty-eight days, then another umpire must be appointed by the arbitrators, and so toties quoties (g). Although an agreement or award, as to the amount of remuneration, may have been made, the Postmaster-General may require, by notice in writing, any addition to be made to the services performed; and in such case, and also in case of a discontinuance of any part of the services, a fresh agreement must be entered into, or award made, as before mentioned, to settle the amount of remuneration to be paid for such increased or diminished services; and compensation may also be awarded for any loss occasioned by the discontinuance or alteration of the services previously agreed to be performed (h). The services required by the Postmaster-General to be performed are not in any case to be suspended, postponed or deferred by reason of the amount of remuneration not having been fixed upon, or by reason of an award not having been made (i).

Remuneration to be paid for conveying the mails.

After a contract or award settling the amount of remuneration has been in operation for three years, the railway company may require that the remuneration to be paid shall be again submitted to arbitration (k).

Lastly, the Postmaster-General is authorized to determine the performance of any services, by giving the company six months' notice in writing (l); or absolutely to put an end to any such services

It is also declared, that the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 98, shall be construed according to the respective interpretations of the terms and expressions contained in the Post-Office Act, 1 Vict. c. 36, so far as those interpretations are not repugnant to, or inconsistent with, the context of such provisions; and that the act shall also be deemed to be a Post-Office act, and that the penalties therein mentioned may be recovered as penalties are recovered under the Post-Office acts (n); but any justice of the peace having jurisdiction may hear and determine any offence which may subject any company to a pecuniary penalty not exceeding 20*l*.

5 & 6 Vict. c. 55,
s. 20, App. 15.

7 & 8 Vict. c. 85,
s. 12, App. 21.

By the annual Mutiny Acts, justices of the peace are empowered, in cases of emergency, to provide carriages and horses, by compulsory powers, for the transport of troops; and, it being considered desirable to make some similar provision for despatching troops by railways, the Legislature has provided, that, whenever it is necessary to move any of the officers or soldiers of the line, ordnance corps, marines, militia, or the police force, by railway, the directors are required to permit such forces, with their baggage, &c., to be conveyed at the usual hours of starting, at such prices, or upon such conditions, as may be contracted for between the Secretary-at-War and the railway company, upon production of a route or order for their conveyance, signed by the proper authorities. This is the only general legislative enactment now in force applicable to railway companies incorporated previous to 1844; but a subsequent statute requires railway companies incorporated, or obtaining an extension of their powers, by any act passed in 1844, or in any subsequent session (o), to provide the before-mentioned conveyance at fares not exceeding—

For each commissioned officer proceeding on duty in a first-class carriage	2 d . per mile (p).
For each soldier, &c., and their wives, or children above twelve years old	1 d . per mile.

(o) But a clause is now inserted in every special act, whereby the company are made subject to the General Railway Acts, including 5 & 6 Vict. c. 55, and 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85.

(p) It would seem that the company cannot charge anything for a fraction of a mile, as 21 & 22 Vict. c. 75 only applies to cheap trains under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85, s. 6. See post, 473, note (u).

Such soldiers and their families must be conveyed in convenient and protected carriages; and every officer may carry one cwt., and soldier, soldier's wife, &c., half a cwt. of personal luggage, free of charge (q); all excess being paid for at the rate of not more than one halfpenny per pound. All public baggage, stores, arms, ammunition, and other necessaries and things, must be conveyed at charges not exceeding twopence per ton per mile, the assistance of the military being given in loading and unloading such goods. But the company are not bound to convey gunpowder and other combustible matters, except upon such conditions as may be agreed upon by the Secretary-at-War and the company (r).

The above provisions have been also extended to sailors and naval coast volunteers (s).

IV. Obligation to provide Third-Class (Parliamentary) Trains.

All passenger (t) railway companies incorporated or obtaining an extension of their powers in or after 1844, are required, by means of one train at least, to travel upon their railway from one end to the other, once at least each way on every week-day, (except Christmas-day and Good Friday, but this exception does not extend to Scotland,) under the following conditions:—

- "To start at an hour to be from time to time fixed by the directors, subject to the approval of the Board of Trade.
- "To travel at an average rate of speed, not less than twelve miles an hour, including stoppages.
- "To take up and set down passengers (if required) at every passenger station.
- "Carriages to be provided with seats, and protected from the weather.
- "Fares not to exceed one penny for each mile (u).

(r) 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85, s. 12, post, App. 20. By 23 & 24 Vict. c. 139, s. 20, it is enacted, that not more than one hundred barrels of gunpowder shall be conveyed at one time in any carriage forming part of a railway train. Sect. 18, which limits the quantity of gunpowder which persons other than manufacturers may "have or keep," does not apply to a carrier who has a larger quantity at a temporary halting place in the course of transit. See Biggs v. Mitchell, 31 L. J. (M. C.) 163; 2 Best & S. 523, on (u) Under this clause it was decided in Ireland, that where a company charged $2\frac{1}{2}d.$ for a distance exceeding two and less than three miles, it was an overcharge which rendered the company liable to an action for damages. *Rice v. “ Each passenger to be allowed half a cwt. of luggage (t), not being merchandise or other articles carried for hire or profit; and any excess to be charged by weight, at a rate not exceeding the lowest rate of charge for passengers' luggage by other trains.

“ Children under twelve years of age to be carried at half fare, and children under three years free.”

The foregoing enactment does not extend to the conveyance of third-class passengers on Sundays; but if a company runs any trains on that day, they are required, by such train (each way) as shall stop at the greatest number of stations, to provide carriages for third-class passengers, at a like fare of one penny for each mile (u). If any company refuse or wilfully neglect to comply with the foregoing provisions within a reasonable time, a penalty of 20*l.* per day is forfeited (x). But, for the relief of railway companies, it is provided, that no tax shall be levied upon their receipts in respect of the above-mentioned cheap trains (y). This exemption from duty, however, does not extend to any railway train which is not a train running on at least six days of the week, or else a train running to or from a market town on a market-day, and approved of by the Lords of the Committee of Privy Council for Trade and Plantations as a cheap train for the conveyance of passengers to or from market, or a train approved by the said Lords of the Committee of Privy Council as an ordinary train of the railway travelling on Sunday, and conveying third-class passengers at fares not exceeding one penny per mile (z).

The Board of Trade have a discretionary power to dispense with certain of the conditions imposed by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85, if other more beneficial arrangements are substituted (a).

Cheap trains for labouring classes.

The Metropolitan Railway (Finsbury Circus Extension) Act, 1864 (b), contains a provision compelling the company to run cheap trains for the labouring classes. And in many of the railway acts passed in 1864 (c) there is also contained a similar provision for the benefit of artisans, mechanics and daily labourers (both male and

V. Regulations as to Leases of Railways (d).

Railway companies are under various restrictions with reference to their powers of leasing a railway. The Railways Clauses Consolidation Act enacts, that, "where a company are authorized by their special act to lease the railway, or any part thereof, the lease to be executed in pursuance of such authority shall contain certain specified covenants; and such lease entitles the company or person to whom it is granted to the free use of the railway or portion of railway comprised therein, and of all the powers and privileges granted to and which might otherwise be exercised and enjoyed by the company," &c.; and such lessee shall be subject to all the obligations by that or the special act imposed on the company.

8 & 9 Vict. c. 20,
s. 112, App. 94.*

Many of the special railway acts passed during the early part of 1845, contained general powers, enabling railway companies to grant or accept a lease, sale or transfer of their own or other lines of railway; but, it being afterwards considered that these powers ought not to have been granted, a statute was passed towards the close of that session, which enacts, that "it shall not be lawful for such companies, by virtue of any powers contained in any act passed in the then present session, to make or grant, or for any other railway company or party, by virtue of any such powers, to accept, a sale, lease or other transfer of any railway, unless under the authority of a distinct provision in some act of Parliament to that effect, specifying by name the railway to be so leased, sold, or transferred, and the company or party by whom such lease, sale, or transfer may be respectively made, granted, or accepted" (e).

*8 & 9 Vict. c. 96,
App. 102.*

By 21 & 22 Vict. c. 75, s. 3 (f), it is provided that it shall not be lawful for any canal or navigation company being also a railway company, or entitled to work any railway constructed under an act of Parliament, after 2nd August, 1858, to accept a lease of the whole or any part of the undertaking of any other railway and canal company, or of any canal or navigation company, or of the tolls, dues, or charges,

(d) See on this subject, ante, 63.

(e) These restrictions of the powers to lease railways arise from a jealousy, which has induced the legislature to institute inquiries, as to the effects likely to be produced by the amalgamation of railways. This subject is discussed in another part of this work. See ante, Chapter II.

7 & 8 Vict. c. 85,
s. 1, App. 18.

If, after the end of twenty-one years from the passing of any railway act of 1844 or any subsequent session, the clear annual profits divisible upon the subscribed and paid-up capital stock of such railway, upon the average of the three then last preceding years, shall equal or exceed 10*l.* per cent., the Lords of the Treasury may, upon giving three months' notice to the company, revise the scale of tolls, fares and charges limited by the act relating to the railway, and fix such a new scale as shall be likely to reduce the divisible profits to 10*l.* per cent.; but no revised scale can take effect unless accompanied by a guarantee that the divisible profits, in case of any deficiency therein, shall be annually made good to the said rate of 10*l.* per cent.; and it is also provided, that a revised scale shall not be again revised, or the guarantee withdrawn, otherwise than with the consent of the company, for the further period of twenty-one years.

Sect. 2.

Or the Lords of the Treasury, at the end of the said period of twenty-one years (whatever be the rate of divisible profits), may, upon giving three months' notice to the company, purchase any such railway, upon payment of a sum equal to twenty-five years' purchase of the annual divisible profits, or, in certain cases, at a price to be fixed by arbitration; but no option to purchase can be exercised whilst a revised scale of tolls is in force.

Sect. 3.

The above-mentioned option of revision or purchase is not applicable to any railway authorized to be made by any act passed previous to the session 1844, or to any new branch of such railway, if less than five miles in length. It is also provided, that the option to purchase any new branch shall not be exercised without including the railway also.

Sect. 4.

The directors of railways within the provisions above mentioned are required to keep certain accounts of their receipts during the three years next preceding the period at which the option of revision or purchase becomes available.

No notice of revision or purchase can be given under the above-mentioned powers until an act of Parliament has been obtained for authorizing the said guarantee, or the levy of the purchase-money, and for determining the manner in which the option shall be exercised; and three months' notice of the intention to apply for such act of Parliament must be given to the company affected thereby.

Powers to Purchase or Revise Tolls.

VII. Obligation to permit Branch Railways to be made by Landowners.

For the purpose of enabling branch railways to be made, in certain cases, the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act enacts, that "that or the special act shall not prevent the owners or occupiers of lands adjoining to the railway or any other persons (h), from laying down any collateral branches of railway to communicate with the railway for the purpose of bringing carriages upon it, but subject to 5 & 6 Vict. c. 55 (i), and the company are required, at the expense of such owners, &c., to make openings in the rails, in places where the communication can be made with safety to the public, and without injury or inconvenience; and the company may not take any toll for the passing of passengers, &c. along any branch; but the branch may not run parallel to the railway, and openings may not be made in certain places; and persons using the branch are subject to the company's bye-laws, and are required to lay down the most approved off-set plates and switches" (k).

The powers which may be exercised by the Board of Trade in regulating branch railways have been already considered (l).

VIII. Obligation to permit Telegraphs to be constructed.

Every railway company is required to allow the Board of Trade to establish and lay down upon their lands a line of electrical telegraph for her Majesty's service, and to give every reasonable facility for laying down and using the same on her Majesty's service, subject to such reasonable remuneration to be paid to the company as may be agreed upon, or, in case of disagreement, as may be settled by arbitration. And it is provided, that, subject to a prior right of use for the purposes of her Majesty, the telegraph may be used by the company, for the purposes of the railway, upon terms to be agreed upon, or, in case of disagreement, as may be settled by arbitration. Injuries to electric or magnetic telegraphs.

24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 37.

By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 37 (which however does not extend to Scotland, sect. 78), it is enacted, that whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously cut, break, throw down, destroy, injure or remove any battery, machinery, wire, cable, post, or other matter or thing whatsoever, being part of, or being used or employed in or about any electric or magnetic telegraph, or in the working thereof; or shall unlawfully and maliciously prevent or obstruct in any manner whatsoever, the sending, conveyance or delivery of any communication by any such telegraph, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour: Provided, that if it shall appear to any justice, on the examination of any person charged with any offence against this section, that it is not expedient to the ends of justice that the same should be prosecuted by indictment, the justice may proceed summarily to hear and determine the same, and the offender shall on conviction thereof, at the discretion of the justice, either be committed to the common gaol or house of correction, there to be imprisoned only, or to be imprisoned and kept to hard labour for any term not exceeding three months, or else shall forfeit and pay such sum of money, not exceeding ten pounds as to the justice shall seem meet (m).

Obligation to permit Telegraphs to be constructed.

By "The United Kingdom Electric Telegraph Act, 1862," it is enacted:—

25 & 26 Vict.
c. cxxxi. s. 42.

Sect. 42. Subject to the provisions of this act, it shall be lawful for the company, by agreement with the owners, lessees and occupiers of any land, house or building, or with the proprietors or lessees of any railway, navigation, canal or navigable river, or the undertakers, directors, conservators, trustees, commissioners, or other persons interested in, or having the charge of such canal, navigation or river, or the tolls thereof, and according to the terms of such agreement, to lay, maintain, repair, and renew any posts, poles, standards, stays, struts or other apparatus for carrying, suspending or otherwise supporting such telegraphs in, upon, over, along, across or under such land, house, building, railway, navigation, canal or navigable river; but none of the powers or provisions of this act shall extend or apply to any railway, navigation, canal or navigable river, or any of the stations, towing-paths, lands, wharves, works or buildings belonging to or connected therewith respectively, except with the consent in writing of the company under their common seal, or of the person to whom the same respectively shall belong, or of such undertakers, directors, conservators, commissioners, or other persons as aforesaid, first had and obtained; but this provision shall not extend to prevent the company from laying telegraphs along, across, or over any street, although such street may cross or be crossed by a railway, navigation, canal or navigable river: Provided that such telegraphs do not in anywise damage, and are not calculated to damage the railway, navigation, canal or navigable river, or any of the works connected therewith, or interfere with any alteration or improvement thereof, and do not at all interrupt or interfere with, and are not calculated to interrupt or interfere with the use, alteration or improvement thereof, or the passage and conveyance of traffic along the same.

ings, railways,

Sect. 43. No telegraph or any support, or work connected therewith, shall be so laid, placed or continued along any railway as to stop the access thereto for engines and carriages from any other railway forming a junction therewith, or along any navigation, canal, navigable river or dock, so as to stop up, prevent or otherwise interfere with the access thereto for vessels, barges or boats, whether with or without masts, from any other navigation, canal or navigable river, or any dock, basin or cut communicating therewith, or in any way impede the traffic passing to or from any such railway, or to or from any such navigation, canal, navigable river or dock, basin or cut.

Telegraphs and works not to be so placed as to impede traffic passing from one railway, &c., to another.

Sect. 43.

And by sect. 47. If any company, or persons being the proprietors or lessees of any railway, canal, navigable river, navigation, docks, basins, gas or waterworks, or any corporation, commissioners, board, undertakers, conservators, trustees or other body, who shall for the time being be entitled to make use of, or to execute, construct, maintain, alter or improve any works, or any waterway or other way or road, or other easement within or upon any house or other building, or land or street, or if any owner, lessee or occupier for the time being of any house or other building or land in, over or under which house or other building, or land or street, any tube, wire or other apparatus may pass shall state in writing to the company that it is necessary for the improvement or other use of, or for the execution, construction, maintenance, alteration or improvement of any work or water, or other way or road or easement, which any such owner, lessee or occupier, company, corporation, commissioners, board, undertakers, conservators, trustees or other body shall be entitled to make, execute, construct, maintain, alter, improve, or use within or upon any such house or other building, or land or street, or for the use or enjoyment of any such work, water or other way, or road or easement as aforesaid, or for the objects or purposes of any such works, water or other way, or road or easement, that the tube, wire or other apparatus should be displaced, the company shall with all convenient speed, after any such notice, remove such tube, wire or other apparatus so far as such removal may be necessary to avoid interference with any such improvement or other use of, or the execution, construction, alteration, improvement or maintenance of any works, water or other way, or road or easement, which any such party may be entitled to make, or the use or enjoyment of the said works, water or other way, or road or easement, and the objects and purposes thereof, within or upon any such house or other building, or land or street (o).

There are similar provisions in "The Universal Private Telegraph Company's Act, 1861," 24 & 25 Vict. c. lxi. ss. 25, 26; and in "Bonelli's Electric Telegraph Act, 1861," 24 & 25 Vict. c. xcii. ss. 19, 20.

c. 112, s. 6.

It may be well to remark in this place that, by "The Telegraph Act, 1863," any company authorized to construct and maintain telegraphs, may, subject to the restrictions and provisions of that act, place and maintain a telegraph and posts under, in, upon, over, along or across any land or building, or any railway (p) or canal, and may alter or remove the same. But—

The duties payable in respect of railway passengers are levied under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 79, which, after repealing 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 120, enacts, that there shall be paid in Great Britain for passengers conveyed upon any railway, "For and in respect of all passengers conveyed for hire upon or along any railway, a duty at and after the rate of 5*l.* for every 100*l.*, upon all sums received or charged for the hire, fare, or conveyance of all such passengers." This tax is payable by the company actually receiving the money from the public (q), but is not payable in respect of passengers conveyed in the third-class trains, travelling under the conditions imposed by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85(r), commonly called parliamentary trains. And every company must

Every company must also give a bond, with sufficient sureties, to be renewed as often as it shall become forfeited, or as the parties thereto shall die or become bankrupt or insolvent, or reside in parts beyond the seas, or whenever the said commissioners shall require it to be renewed, for the due performance of all matters required to be done by the above act; and, on default of such bond being given or renewed, 100*l.* for every day of such default is forfeited (u).

*Obligation to pay
and keep books.*

With respect to rent-charges, the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85, provides, that, if a rent-charge, or part of a rent-charge, apportioned under the Tithe Commutation Act upon lands taken or purchased by a railway company, or upon any part thereof, becomes in arrear, the person entitled to the rent-charge may distrain to recover such arrears upon the effects of the company, whether on the land charged with such distress or not (x).

(f) 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 36. See infra, note (g).

(g) 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 34. This and 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 36, neither of which apply to Scotland, are taken from 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, s. 15, which was repealed by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 95. The words of that act are "wilfully do or cause to be done anything in such a manner as to obstruct any engine or carriage using any railway, or to endanger the safety of persons conveyed in or upon the same." The above acts are more extensive. In R. v. Holroyd, 2 M. & Rob. 339, upon an indictment under 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, s. 15, it appeared that large quantities of earth and rubbish were found placed across the railway, and the prosecutors' case was, that this had been done by the defendant wilfully and in order to obstruct the use of the railway;

whilst the defendant's case was that the earth, &c. had been accidentally dropped on the railway: Maule, J., told the jury, that if the rubbish had been dropped on the rails by mere accident, the defendant was not guilty, but it was by no means necessary, in order to bring the case within the act, that the defendant should have thrown the rubbish on the rails expressly with the view to upset the train of carriages. If the defendant designedly placed these substances having a tendency to produce an obstruction, not caring whether they actually impeded the carriages or not, that was a case within the act. And on the jury asking what was the meaning of the term "wilfully" used in the statute, Maule, J., added, "he should consider the act to have been wilfully done, if the defendant intentionally placed the rubbish on the line, knowing that it was a substance likely to produce an obstruction; if for instance he had done so in order to throw upon the company's officers the necessary trouble of removing the rubbish." This decision throws light on the meaning of "wilful" in the above section. And see R. v. Bradford, 29 L. J. (M. C.) 171, and note (k), post.

The clause is taken from 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, s. 7 (which was repealed by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 95), and the word "unlawfully" substituted for "wilfully." In *R. v. And whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously pull or throw down or in anywise destroy any bridge (whether over any stream of water or not), or any viaduct or aqueduct, over or under which bridge, viaduct or aqueduct any highway, railway or canal shall pass, or do any injury with intent, and so as thereby to render such bridge, viaduct or aqueduct, or the highway, railway or canal passing over or under the same, or any part thereof, dangerous or impassable, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the court, to similar punishment (m). Injuries to bridges and viaducts.

It is also enacted, that if any person shall wilfully obstruct or impede any officer or agent of any railway company in the execution of his duty upon any railway, or upon or in any of the stations, or other works or premises connected therewith; or if any person shall wilfully trespass (n) upon any railway, or any of the stations, or other works or premises connected therewith, and shall refuse to quit the same upon request to him made by any officer or agent of the company; every such offender, and all others aiding or assisting therein, may be seized and detained by any such officer or agent, or any person whom he may call to his assistance, until such offender can be conveniently taken before some justice of the peace for the county or place wherein such offence was committed, who may inflict a fine of 5*l.* on the offender, and, in default of payment, imprison him for two months, if the fine be not in the meantime paid (o). Proceedings cannot be quashed for want of form, or be removed by certiorari (p). Obstructing officers.
Or trespassing on railway.

And the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act enacts, that it shall be lawful for any officer or agent of the company, and all persons called by him to his assistance, to seize and detain any person who shall have committed any offence against the provisions of that or the special act, or any act incorporated therewith, and whose home and residence shall be unknown to such officer or agent, and convey him, with all convenient despatch, before some justice, without any other warrant and authority than that and the special act; and such justice shall proceed, with all convenient despatch, to the hearing and determining of the complaint against such offender (q). Transient offenders.

The penalty for these offences is forty shillings.

Forging pass.

The forgery of a railway pass is an offence at common law, but the mere uttering it is no offence, unless some fraud was actually perpetrated (t).

Obtaining ticket by false pretences.

And if a person by false pretence obtain a railway ticket from the company, which enables him to travel on the railway, this is an offence within 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 88, for which an indictment for obtaining a chattel by false pretences will lie (u). If such a ticket be fraudulently taken it is felony, although the ticket would have been delivered up at the end of the journey (x).

XII. Regulations as to Bye-Laws.

Bye-laws affecting the public.

The jurisdiction of the Board of Trade in respect of bye-laws has been already considered (y).

By the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act (z), it is enacted, that a railway company may from time to time make regulations for the following purposes:—

For regulating the mode by which, and the speed at which, carriages using the railway are to be moved or propelled;

For regulating the times of the arrival and departure of any such carriages;

For regulating the loading and unloading of such carriages, and the weights which they are respectively to carry;

For regulating the receipt and delivery of goods, and other things which are to be conveyed upon such carriages;

For preventing the smoking of tobacco, and the commission of any other nuisance, in or upon such carriages, or in any of the stations or premises occupied by the company;

And, generally, for regulating the travelling upon, or using and working of the railway (a).

(r) A passenger could not be convicted under this section for riding a shorter distance along the railway than that for which he has paid his fare, and so evading the payment of a larger fare for a short distance, than is charged for a long one. R. v. Frere, 4 E. & B. 598.

Bye-laws.

And, for better enforcing the observance of such regulations, the company may, subject to 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97 (b), make bye-laws, and, from time to time, repeal or alter them; such bye-laws must be reduced into writing, and have the common seal of the company affixed, and, as we have seen, must be approved by the Board of Trade. Any person offending against a bye-law is liable to a penalty (c); and if the infraction of the bye-law is attended with danger and annoyance to the public, or hindrance to the company, they may interfere summarily to obviate the danger, &c. (d). The substance of such bye-laws must be printed, and kept affixed on the front, or other conspicuous part of every wharf or station belonging to the company, otherwise a penalty may not be enforced (e). The company are justified in acting upon such bye-laws, and provision is made for proving their publication (f).

It is remarkable, however, that the Railways Clauses Act contains no provision analogous to sect. 127 of the Companies Clauses Act, as to proof of the bye-laws themselves, in case of prosecutions for offences against them. It has, however, been decided by the Court of Common Pleas (g), that bye-laws made pursuant to the Railways Clauses Act are documents of a public nature and proveable as such, i. e. by an examined and certified copy.

The company may also, under the Companies Clauses Act, make bye-laws, for regulating the conduct of their officers and servants, and for providing for the due management of the affairs of the company, and alter and repeal the same; such bye-laws must be authenticated by the seal of the company, and a copy given to every officer and servant affected thereby (h). A penalty, not exceeding 5*l.* for each offence, may, by such bye-laws, be imposed upon all persons being officers and servants of the company (i). But so that a justice

(c) These penalties are recoverable by summary proceeding before two justices, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 145, post, App. 98. The breach of a bye-law does not seem to be an offence against sect. 154, which will justify the detention of the party, unless the bye-law relates to any of the matters enumerated in ss. 103, 104, in which cases express authority is given to apprehend and detain an offender. In Chilton v. London and Croydon R. Co., 16 M. & W. 212; 5 Railw. C. 4; 16 L. J. (Exch.) 89, it was decided under a special act, that the company's servants were not justified in taking the plaintiff before a justice for a breach of a bye-law, which ordered a passenger, who failed to produce his ticket, to pay a fare from the place where the train originally started. Whether such a bye-law is good, quære.

C.) 57, where it was held that a man might be convicted for breach of a bye-law, on proof of publication at the two stations at which he embarked and disembarked, and that it was not necessary to prove publication at every station. Williams, J., diss.

Bye-laws.

may order a part only of the penalty to be paid (k). A copy of bye-laws, with the common seal of the company affixed, is sufficient evidence of bye-laws (l).

The power of railway companies to make bye-laws is regulated by the above acts of Parliament, and sometimes by their special act. As a general principle, all bye-laws in restraint of trade must be reasonable and beneficial to the public, or they cannot be supported (m). Where, by a local act, the proprietors of a public navigation were empowered to make bye-laws for the good government of the company, and for the good and orderly using of the navigation, and also for the well governing of the bargemen, watermen, and boatmen, who should carry any goods upon any part of the navigation, and to impose such reasonable fines upon all persons offending against the same, as to the company should seem meet; and the company made a bye-law that the navigation should be closed every Sunday throughout the year, and that no business should be transacted thereon during that time (works of necessity only excepted), nor should any person during such time navigate any boat, &c., it was decided, that such bye-law was illegal and void, and not authorized by the statute (n).

It has been doubted, whether a bye-law, which required a passenger who failed to produce his ticket to pay the fare from the place whence the train originally started, is valid (o).

And a bye-law, which provided that "every first-class passenger will be allowed 112 lbs., and every second-class passenger 56 lbs. of luggage free of charge, but the company will not be responsible for the care of the same, unless booked and paid for accordingly," was held not to exempt the company from responsibility for the loss of a passenger's luggage (within the weight allowed), which had been delivered to one of its servants, though not booked and paid for; in the absence of evidence that the company had provided means for booking luggage (p). And in a subsequent case (q), the same bye-law was held void, as being in contravention of the company's special act, which enacted, "that without extra charge it should be lawful for every passenger travelling upon the railway to take with him articles of clothing not exceeding 40 lbs. in weight, and four cubic feet in dimensions, and that the company shall in no case be respon-

(an intermediate station between C. and N.), and a person took a ticket from C. to N. but got out at D., and refused to pay the 2s. difference; it was held that he could not be convicted under the bye-law (r).

CHAPTER XI.

ARBITRATION BETWEEN RAILWAY COMPANIES.

Railway Companies Arbitration Act, 1859.

22 & 23 Vict.
c. 52, App.

AN important act of Parliament was passed in 1859, for the better providing for the settlement by arbitration of matters in which railway companies in the United Kingdom are mutually interested. It is called "The Railway Companies Arbitration Act, 1859" (a). By the 2nd section of that act it is enacted, that any two or more railway companies, in the act called "The Companies," from time to time by writing under their common seals may agree to refer, and may refer to arbitration, any existing or future differences, questions or other matters whatsoever in which they are mutually interested, and which they might lawfully settle or dispose of by agreement between themselves, and may delegate to the persons to whom the reference is made any power to determine the terms of any contract to be made between the companies, which the directors might lawfully delegate to any committee of themselves respectively. The companies jointly, but not otherwise, from time to time by writing under their common seals may add to, alter or revoke any agreement of reference, or any of the terms, &c. thereof (b). Such references are declared to be binding (c). Where the companies agree, the reference shall be made to a single arbitrator (d), otherwise, where there are two companies, the reference must be to two arbitrators, and where there are three or more companies, to as many arbitrators as there are companies (e). Where there are two or more arbitrators, each company shall by writing under their common seal appoint one, and give notice to the other companies (f); and if they fail to appoint an arbitrator within fourteen days, the Board of Trade may appoint one (g). The act then provides for the appointment of arbitrators by companies (h), and the Board of Trade (i) to supply vacancies, and declares the appointment of an arbitrator not to be revocable (k). Provision is then made for the appointment of an umpire, and for the supply of any vacancy caused by his death, &c. (l), and it is enacted that where there are two or more arbitrators, if they do not, within such a time as the companies agree on, or failing such agreement within thirty days after the reference, agree on their award, the matters shall stand referred to the umpire (m). Power is given to the arbitrators and umpire to call for books and documents, and to administer an oath to witnesses (n). Unless otherwise agreed by the companies, the arbitrators may proceed as they think fit (o), and even in the absence of the other companies, after notice (p). Several awards may be made (q), and if made in due time will bind all parties (r). Power is given to the umpire to extend the period for making his award (s); and it is provided that no award shall be set for irregularity or informality (t), but the award is to be binding on the parties (u), and full effect given to it by the superior courts (x). Except where it is otherwise agreed, costs are to be in the discretion of the arbitrator (y), and if the award does not otherwise determine, the costs of the arbitration and award are to be borne by the companies in equal shares, and in other respects the companies are to bear their own costs (z). Lastly, provision is made for making the submission a rule of court, and power is given to the court to remit the matter to the arbitrator (a). Costs.

Umpire.

(a) By sects. 72 and 73 of the "Companies Act, 1862," 25 & 26 Vict. c. 89, post, App., companies under that act may refer questions to arbitration in accordance with "The Railway Companies Arbitration Act, 1859."

CHAPTER XII.

AMALGAMATION OF RAILWAY COMPANIES, AND WORKING AGREEMENTS BETWEEN COMPANIES.

Notices required previous to application to Parliament for amalgamation.

Further requirements of Standing Orders.

Amalgamation.—We have already considered the notices required to be given when it is intended to apply to Parliament for powers to amalgamate with another company (a).

We have also seen that it is provided by the Standing Orders (b), that no powers of amalgamation shall be contained in any bill for the construction of a railway; and that no such powers shall be given to any railway company with reference to any other undertaking already authorized by any act or acts, nor to any other incorporated company with reference to any railway, unless, previously to the application to Parliament for such purpose, the several companies who may be parties to such amalgamation shall have proved certain matters to the satisfaction of the Board of Trade; and in case such powers are applied for in respect of works intended to be authorized by a bill of the same session, certain other matters must be proved to the satisfaction of the Board of Trade; and that no such powers shall be given in respect of works intended to be authorized by any act for which it is intended to apply in any subsequent session (c). It is also provided, that in bills for the amalgamation of railway companies the amount of capital created by such amalgamation shall in no case exceed the sum of the capitals of the companies so amalgamated (d).

We have also considered how far the Court of Chancery will enforce the performance of agreements for amalgamation (e).

Rights and liabilities of amalgamated company.

The legal rights and liabilities of the amalgamated company depend in a great measure upon the powers, &c. conferred upon them by their act for amalgamation. The question, how far an amalgamated company was bound by a covenant entered into with a private landholder by one of the companies previous to amalgamation, has been discussed in the House of Lords, in a case which has been already referred to (f), and in which it was decided that the company was bound. It has also been held in the House of Lords, that costs can-

With regard to tolls, it is provided by the Railways Clauses Act, 1845 (h), that, when railways are amalgamated, tolls are to be calculated at such rates as if such amalgamated railways had originally formed one line of railway. Tolls.

It remains, therefore, only to call the attention of the reader to the provisions of the Railways Clauses Act, 1863, with respect to amalgamation, which apply where two or more railway companies, respectively incorporated either before or after 28th July, 1863, are amalgamated by a special act passed after that date, and incorporating Part V. of that act. Companies are deemed amalgamated by a special act:—

Sect. 37.

- (2.) Where by the special act a company or companies is or are dissolved, and the undertaking or undertakings of the dissolved company or companies is or are transferred to another existing company, with or without a change in the name of that company.

It is not thought necessary to incumber this part of the work with a statement of these provisions, which are printed at length in the Appendix, and to which the reader is referred.

Working Agreements.]—By the Railways Clauses Act, 1863, certain restrictions were placed on working agreements between companies. Thus, where two or more companies (i) are authorized by a special act, passed after 28th July, 1863, and incorporating Part III. of the Railways Clauses Act, 1863, to agree (j) among themselves with respect to all or any of the following purposes, namely:— Working agreements.

Sect. 23.

When made, the agreement will not, save so far as authorized by the Railways Clauses Acts of 1845, or some other general statute or law in force with respect to the companies parties to the agreement, have any operation unless and until it is sanctioned at a general meeting, to be convened as prescribed by the act, by three-fifths of the shareholders entitled to vote; and it will have no operation until approved by the Board of Trade; nor will it affect the tolls, &c. which the companies are authorized to demand and receive from any person or company, but all such persons and companies will, notwithstanding the agreement, be entitled to the use and benefit of the railways of the companies parties to the agreement, on the same terms and on payment of the same tolls, &c. as they would be if the agreement had not been entered into.

I. Railway Companies considered as Carriers of Goods and Passengers.

A RAILWAY company, as we have seen, is required to permit carriages, properly constructed (a), to pass on the railway on payment of the tolls authorized by the special act, or the company may themselves provide steam power and carriages, for the purpose of conveying passengers and goods, for which they may make such reasonable charges as they may determine upon, not exceeding the charges by the special act authorized to be taken (b).

The company considered as carriers of goods and passengers.

The Railways Clauses Consolidation Act contains the following provisions on this subject:—

8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 86, App. 91.

The company are authorized to use locomotive engines, or other moving power, and carriages drawn thereby, and to carry passengers

(a) See ante, 467.

(b) Each special act must be referred to for the purpose of ascertaining the tolls and charges which a company may take; and it will be seen, that the provisions contained in these acts are very variable. The following statement, extracted from Mr. Bigg's Collection of Special Railway Acts, passed 8 & 9 Vict. (1845), shows the variation in the maximum charges authorized by the special acts of that session (p. xxvii, Introd.):—

The company may not be charged or made liable further or in any other case than where stage-coach proprietors and common carriers would be liable, and are entitled to the benefit of every protection and privilege which stage-coach proprietors and common carriers enjoy: (Sect. 89) (e).

By sect. 90, after reciting that it is expedient that the company should be enabled to vary the tolls upon the railway so as to accommodate them to the circumstances of the traffic, but that such power of varying should not be used for the purpose of prejudicing or favouring particular parties, or for the purpose of collusively and unfairly creating a monopoly, either in the hands of the company or of particular parties, it is enacted, that it shall be lawful, therefore, for the company, subject to the provisions and limitations therein and in the special act contained, from time to time, to alter or vary the tolls (f) by the special act authorized to be taken, either upon the whole or upon any particular portions of the railway, as they shall think fit: Provided that all such tolls be at all times charged equally to all persons (g), and after the same rate, whether per ton per mile Dangerous goods.

The result is, that a railway company may be simply the owners of the way on which others may place steam power and carriages, and convey persons and goods; or they may unite both characters, of owners of the way and carriers on it, in themselves. But although the railway is thus, under certain restrictions, thrown open to the public as a highway, experience proves, that, as the stations and watering-places are necessarily under the entire control of the company, they enjoy a monopoly as carriers on the line. It seems, therefore, to be within the scope and object of this work to state a few of the leading principles of law applicable to carriers.

It was decided in an early case, that railway companies engaged in carrying goods on a railway are common carriers (r): they are therefore subject, in that character, to the same liabilities as other common carriers. If any doubt existed on this point, it is removed by the Railways Clauses Act, which provides "that nothing shall extend to charge or make liable a railway company, further or in any other case than where, according to the law of the realm, stage-coach proprietors and common carriers would be liable; nor shall extend, in any degree, to deprive the company of any protection or privilege which common carriers or stage-coach proprietors may be entitled to, but, on the contrary, the company shall, at all times, be Co., ubi supra. But where an action was brought to recover the difference between the sums charged to plaintiff for the carriage of goods, and those charged to other persons for the conveyance of like goods, it was held that the charges so made must be considered as something done under the authority of the act, and that the company were entitled to notice of action. *Kent v. entitled to the benefit of every such protection and privilege." And by the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, the benefits of the Carriers Act are saved, in respect of articles of the description mentioned in that act.

II. Liabilities of Railway Companies as Carriers at Common Law, and as controlled by the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854.

At common law, a common carrier stands in the situation of an insurer of the property entrusted to him, and is answerable for every loss or damage happening to it whilst in his custody, no matter by what cause occasioned, unless it were by the act of God, such as a tempest, or that of the king's enemies(s). Common carriers are therefore held responsible by the common law for loss by robbery (to prevent combination of robbers and carriers), as well as for the wrongful acts of mere strangers, in regard to the property bailed to them for transportation, and notwithstanding they are not personally, or by their servants, guilty of any negligence or omission of duty; for the case is not within the exception of the act of God or of the public enemy; and they have their remedy over against the wrongdoer for the damages they may sustain by his wrongful act(t). And upon the principle above mentioned, carriers are liable for a loss by an accidental fire or conflagration, while the goods are in their custody(u).

This was the rule of the common law, which regulated all cases in which there was no special contract between carriers and their employers. The result was, that carriers soon found it necessary, for their protection, to make special contracts in all cases where goods of more than ordinary value were delivered to their care(x).

(s) This was laid down in Forward v. Pittard, 1 T. R. 27, and Garside v. Trent Navigation Co., 4 T. R. 581, and it has never been disputed since. Per Cresswell, J., in Richards v. London, Brighton and S. C. R. Co., 7 C. B. 860. (x) As early as Lord Coke's time, we find this practice recommended. In Southcote's case, 4 Rep. 84, Lord Coke observes, "Nota reader, it is good policy for him who takes any goods to keep, to take them in special manner, scil. to keep them as he keeps his own goods, or to keep them the best he can at the peril of the party; or if they happen to be stolen or purloined, that he shall not answer for them; for he who accepteth them ought to take them in such or the like manner, or otherwise he may be charged by his general acceptance." In Butt v. Great Western R. Co., 11 C. B. 140; 20 L. J. (C.P.) 241, the Court of Common Pleas, on the authority of Finucane v. Small, 1 Esp. 315, intimated that at common law a carrier is not liable for felony committed by his servants, unless he has been guilty of gross negligence, sed quære. Finucane v. Small was not the case of a carrier, and see cas. cit. supra, note (t); Butt v. G. W. R. Co. was explained in G. W. R. Co. v. Rimmell, 18 C. B. 575; 27 L. J. (C. P.) 201. See further, post, 514.

The legislature (y), in more modern times, has also granted a protection to carriers, which, as we shall see hereafter, affords them much more substantial security than they had attained by resorting to special contracts. The usual course taken by carriers to evade the liabilities they were under at common law was, by inserting in newspapers, distributing in hand-bills, and sticking up in their offices, a notice that they would not be accountable for the loss of any property beyond a certain value, unless insured, and paid for accordingly, at the time of delivery (z). But the mere advertisement by the carrier of the terms and limitation of his responsibility, however public it might have been, had no effect, except upon those persons to whom knowledge of it was directly or constructively brought home; when, however, such knowledge was proved, the notice constituted a special contract between the parties (a).

Companies as Carriers at Common Law.*

Notice limiting liability.

The most usual evidence to show this was, by proof that a notice was put up in the office, where goods were received and entered for the purpose of carriage, in so conspicuous a situation, that it must (unless he were guilty of wilful negligence) have attracted the attention of the plaintiff or his agent. It was, however, decided, that this proof failed where the party who delivered the goods at the office could not read (b); and where the goods were delivered by a porter, who admitted that he had frequently been at the defendants' office, and that he had seen a painted board, but did not suppose that it contained anything material, and in fact had never read it, it was held, that, although the board contained a notice of limitation, the evidence of notice was insufficient (c). So, the proof failed where the notice at the office stated the advantages of carriage by the particular waggon in large letters, and the notice of non-responsibility in small characters (d), although at the termini of the carrier's route notice was given at the offices by means of a board inscribed with large letters. So, where the printed notice was in a situation where the plaintiff was not likely to see it (e). So, also, where the goods were not delivered at the office where the notice was exhibited, but were delivered into a cart sent round to receive goods; or at an intermediate stage between the two places, from each of which the carrier conveyed goods to the other, there being no notice at the place of delivery, although notices were suspended at the two termini (f).

Proof of notice,

Another usual mode of proof was by evidence that notice was given by means of printed cards, or by advertisements in the public newspapers; but it was ruled that this was insufficient, unless it be proved that the plaintiff had seen such cards, or read the newspapers (g), and even then it was a question for the jury (h).

Where it appeared that the plaintiff had been in the habit of sending parcels by the defendant's conveyance, and that two parcels had at different times been lost, and that the plaintiff had acquiesced in those losses, desiring the witness for the future to insure the parcels sent, it was held to be evidence of the plaintiff's knowledge that the defendant had limited his responsibility (i). And the defendant might show, that, when other parcels were delivered to him by the plaintiff, a ticket was delivered with each parcel containing the notice (k).

Effect of notice.

In all cases where the notice could not be brought home to the person interested in the goods, or his agent, directly or constructively, the notice was a mere nullity, and the carrier was responsible according to the general principles of the common law (l). But common carriers could not, by thus giving a notice, exempt themselves from all responsibility, so as to evade altogether the salutary policy of the common law. The effect of the notice was merely to divest the carrier of the character of an insurer; but not to exempt him from responsibility for losses by the malfeasance, misfeasance, or gross negligence of himself and servants. If, therefore, he converted the goods to a wrong use; if he negligently made a wrong delivery to a person not entitled to them (m); or if he were guilty of gross negligence in the carriage or care of them, the loss must be borne by the carrier; notwithstanding his notice: for the terms of it are uniformly construed not to exempt him from such losses (n).

It was for some time doubtful whether a carrier was liable for losses occasioned by ordinary negligence, in cases where he had given the usual notice. The case of Wyld v. Pickford (o), however, decided this question in the affirmative.

The Carriers Act (p), to which we shall presently refer, rendered such general notices (when given by land carriers (q)) of no avail (r), but they are still frequently given; and as carriers were clearly at liberty to make a special contract with reference to each particular transaction relating to the carrying of goods (s), it became the almost invariable practice for railway companies to carry horses, and other valuable animals, under such special contracts; so that, as it will be seen by numerous cases (t), they were enabled to exempt themselves from the effects of even gross negligence (u). This led to the interference of the legislature, and by the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854 (x), the following restrictions are imposed:—

“Every such company as aforesaid (y) shall be liable for the loss of or for any injury done to (z) any horses, cattle or other animals (a), or to any articles, goods or things, in the receiving (b), forwarding or delivering thereof (c), occasioned by the

And it is sufficient for a carrier, who has received goods to be carried upon a special contract, if charged as a common carrier, to traverse the bailment on such terms. Shaw v. York and North Midland R. Co., 13 Q. B. 347; Crouch v. L. and N. W. R. Co., 7 Exch. 705. Though it is usual now in practice to plead the special contract. *Peek v. North Staffordshire R. When contracts of this description were made, before the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, it was immaterial whether the party sending the cattle or goods signed a written document or note; it was sufficient if a ticket were delivered to him, or even if a verbal statement was made by a clerk in the office. Morville v. Great Northern R. Co., 21 L. J. (Q. B.) 319; 16 Jur. 528; and see Walker v. York and North Midland R. Co., 2 Exch. 750; 23 L. J. (Q. B.) 73; York and Berwick R. Co. v. Crisp, 23 L. J. (C. P.) 125. But see now 17 & 18 Vict. c. 31, s. 7, supra, in text. It seems that the company would be liable for injuries done to cattle in the course of their being removed to and from the railway carriages in which they are carried, just as if the accident occurred whilst they were travelling over the line of railway: See Willoughby v. Horridge, 22 L. J. (C. P.) 90; where a ferryman was held liable for the loss of a horse, caused by using a defective stage to land the animal on the shore. The agreement by carriers to be accountable for the safe carriage of a parcel expressed to be of greater value than 20*l.* requires no stamp, if the value of the carriage be below that sum; for the carriage, and not the goods, is the subject of the agreement. Latham v. Rutley, 1 Ry. & M. 13; see 8 Exch. 624.

(u) In the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, in Beal v. South Devon R. Co., 11 L. T. (N. S.) 184, it is laid down that “for all practical purposes the rule may be stated thus, that the failure to exercise reasonable care, skill and diligence is gross negligence. What is reasonable varies in the case of a gratuitous bailee, and that of a bailee for hire. From the former is reasonably expected such care and diligence as persons ordinarily use in their own affairs, and such skill as he has. From the latter is reasonably expected care and diligence, such as are usual, or, in the absence of usage, are to be expected by an analogy to the ordinary and usual course of similar business, and such skill as he undertakes to have, namely, the skill usual in the business for which he receives payment.”

(x) By 26 & 27 Vict. c. 92, s. 31, post, App., the provisions of this act are extended to steam-vessels, and to the traffic carried on thereby.

(y) I. e. “Railway Company, Canal Company, and Railway and Canal Company.” The statute does not, therefore, apply to cases where ordinary carriers use a railway for the purpose of carrying cattle. But it is more extensive than the Carriers Act, which only applies to carriers by land.

(z) Deterioration of cattle from want of food and water is an injury within this section. Allday v. Great Western R. Co., 13 Weekly Rep. 43; 34 L. J. (Q. B.)

(a) Dogs were held within it. Harrison v. London, Brighton and South Coast R. Co., 29 L. J. (Q. The reversal of the decision in the Exch. Ch. does not affect this point; 31 L. J. (Q. B.) 113; 2 Best & S. 152.

(b) In Hodgman v. Midland R. Co., 33 L. J. (Q. B.) 233, it was held (Cockburn, C. J., dissentiente), that plaintiff could not recover more than 50*l.* for injuries resulting in death to a valuable horse. The horse was going by rail; whilst in the station, on its way to the platform, the horse backed upon some girders negligently left there by defendants. No ticket had been then taken, nor declaration of value made, or fare demanded.

(b) In Harrison v. London, Brighton and S. C. R. Co., 31 L. J. (Q. B.) 114, Erle, C. J., said, "If the legislature intended to provide for all loss, however occasioned, the words 'loss occasioned by the neglect or default of the company,' would have no meaning, and no operation. The history of the section, as contained in all the judgments, from Johnson v. Midland R. Co., 4 Exch. 367, and Simons v. Great Western R. Co., downwards, shows that the legislature, by the words 'loss occasioned by the neglect or default of the company,' meant, occasioned by culpable conduct and not a mere failure to deliver, occasioned by inevitable accident without any blame."

(e) In Robinson v. South Western R. Co., tried in C. P., Guildhall, 15 Dec., 1864, a London special jury found 5 per cent. on additional value of horse above 50*l.*, for carriage from Liss to London (about 50 miles) reasonable. Some companies charge a small additional per centage per mile, while others charge an equal per centage whatever the distance may be. This latter plan seems unreasonable, though in some particular cases the amount so charged may not be unreasonable.

(f) See post, 510.

(g) A letter, directing the defendants "to forward the marbles uninsured," was held by the House of Lords not to be sufficient, as it did not either expressly or by reference embody the conditions attached by the company to goods uninsured. Peck v. North Staffordshire R. Co., 10 H. L. C. 472; 32 L. J. (Q. B.) 241, affirming S. C. in 27 L. J. (Q. B.) 465, but reversing the judgment of the Exch. Ch., 29 L. J. (Q. B.) 97.

(h) Signature by a carrier employed by both parties, a common agent, is sufficient. Aldridge v. Great Western R. Co., 33 L. J. (C. P.) 161; 15 C. B. (N. S.) 582.

(i) It is said in argument in Beal v. South Devon R. Co., 29 L. J. (Exch.) 441, to be a marvellous instance of blundering legislation) has given rise to considerable litigation. It has, however, been laid down (k), that the true construction of the act, and the result of its provisions, is that a general notice to limit the liability of the company is null and void, but the parties may make special contracts with the company themselves, provided those contracts are signed by them and are adjudged by the court or judge to be just and reasonable. And whereas the monopoly created by railways compels the public to employ them in the conveyance of their goods, the legislature have thought fit to impose the further security that the court shall see that the condition or special contract is just and reasonable. It must, therefore, be considered as settled, until the act of Parliament is altered or repealed, that special contracts are within the enacting clause of sect. 7, though judges have frequently expressed their dissatisfaction at having to decide a question which had much better be left to parties themselves to settle; and the Court of Exchequer, in Beal v. South Devon R. Co. (l), seemed very much disposed to get out of the difficulty by holding any contract which the party had signed to be reasonable, quoad him; and Erle, C. J., and Keating, J., in Harrison v. London, Brighton and South Coast R. Co. (m), expressed an opinion that the section in question is confined in its application to cases where the loss or injury is occasioned by the neglect or default of the company.

It becomes important, therefore, to ascertain what conditions are reasonable and what unreasonable. But it should in the first place be stated, that if conditions are separable they may be separated, and one upheld as reasonable whilst another is held void as unreasonable (n); and a reasonable condition may be applied to a state of facts which makes it unreasonable (o).

The following conditions have been held to be reasonable:—

“Goods conveyed at special or mileage rates must be loaded and unloaded by the owners or their agents, and the company will not be responsible for any risk of stowage, loss or damage, however caused, nor for discrepancy in the delivery as to either quantity, number or have been suggested to Mr. Cardwell by Messrs. Baxendale & Co., trading as Pickford & Co. In all probability, however, the clause as introduced was, as usual, altered by tacking proviso upon proviso, to suit the crochets of various members of Parliament, until it became, as it now stands, almost unintelligible.

Any money which may be received by the company as payment for the conveyance of goods beyond their own limits will be so received only for the convenience of the consignors, and for the purpose of being paid to the other carrier (y)."

On the other hand, the following conditions have been held to be unreasonable. A condition that—"The company will not be accountable for the loss, detention or damage of any package insufficiently or improperly packed, marked, directed or described, or containing a variety of articles liable by breakage to damage each other," with an averment that goods were insufficiently packed, was held to be no answer to an action for the loss of goods, it being quite immaterial whether the goods were properly packed or not if the whole package was lost; and Jervis, C. (e) As to the meaning of the word "loss," see Hearn v. London and South-Western R. Co., 10 Exch. 801.

(f) In Davey v. Mason, Car. & M. 45, it was held that an eyeglass and a gold chain attached were not "trinkets." But the ruling of Lord Abinger, C. B., in that case was disapproved of by the Court of Exchequer in Hart v. Baxendale, 6 Exch. 769, though that does not appear in the report. See per Willes, J., in Bernstein v. Baxendale, 28 L. J. (C. P.) 267, in which case it was held that, "with respect to shirt-pins, bracelets, gilt rings, brooches, tortoiseshell portmonnaies and smelling-bottles, there is a distinction between some of these articles which are used as ornamental to the dress, and others which do not constitute any portion of the dress, and are only occasionally produced, but which, when so produced, are of an ornamental character. The first of these classes, such as shirt-pins, bracelets, rings and brooches, properly come within the definition of trinkets. I think that their object is not utility, but essentially ornament; but even supposing their main object to be that of forming some part of the dress, still, if they are intended to be, as these clearly are, ornamental to the apparel, they are, I think, trinkets. There is more difficulty in dealing with the other portion of these articles, which are not always exhibited, but only produced occasionally, that is, when wanted: these are the portmonnaies and glass smelling-bottles. I think that, although these may be articles of use and of necessity, yet if, by the superaddition of so much ornament, there is given to them such a character as to make their main object ornament, they are trinkets. The intention of this act is to protect carriers of articles of small bulk, but of considerable value; and therefore, if the articles are open to such a construction as to bring them within the act, we ought to adopt that construction. The fusee-boxes of German silver cannot, however, I think, fall within the definition of trinkets. They are made of plain materials, and the main, indeed, almost the sole purpose to which they can be applied, is the use for which they were evidently intended: these are clearly articles of use and not ornament, and are not trinkets." Per Cockburn, C. J., ibid. In Attorney-General v. Harley, 5 Russ. 173; S. C. 7 L. J. (Chan.) 31, ivory fans were found by the Master to be trinkets. In Smith v. London, Brighton and S. C. R. Co., 7 C. B. 783, a plea under this section was held bad for uncertainty.

In Bernstein v. Baxendale, supra, note (f), it was held that silk is not the less silk because it is made up, and therefore a silk guard is within the meaning of the act. See also *Machu v. It is said by the Court of Error, "We think that the act of Parliament requires the person who sends the goods to take the first step by giving that information to the carrier which he alone can give, and that if the sender does not take that first step, then he cannot maintain this action by the force of the first section, which expressly says, that the carrier shall not be liable unless the declaration is made. Such declaration, when made, will lead to other consequences; the carrier will know what he is to have more, according to the tariff which he has stuck up in his office; if that sum is paid and the goods are lost, then of course he would be liable; on the other hand, if he refuses to give a receipt, as provided by the statute, or has omitted to comply with any provision of that kind on his part to be performed, he would lose the protection given by the act."

(a) Machu v. London and South-Western R. Co., 2 Exch. 415; 17 L. J. (Exch.) 271; 12 Jur. 501, is a decision on this section of great importance to railway companies. The action was brought to recover 150*l.*, the value of a bale of silk. It appeared that the plaintiff was a silk manufacturer at Bunhill-row, London, and the bale had been delivered to the defendants, at their office at the Andover-road Station, to be carried to the above address. The value of the bale was not declared when it was delivered, and the ordinary charge only was paid. The bale was placed in a van, under the care of one Johnson, on its arrival at the Vauxhall Station of the company, and a delivery ticket was sent, accompanied with a notice from the company, that they would not be liable for certain articles, including silk, above the value of 10*l.*, unless the value should be declared and the increased charge paid, and with the following notice:—"The company are not responsible for any parcel above the value of 10*l.*, unless declared as such at the time of booking, and entered and paid for accordingly." The bale was stolen by Johnson, on the road between the station and its destination. Johnson was in the employ of Chaplin and Horne, who were employed by the defendants to carry goods for them; but it did not appear under what precise contract. It was thereupon contended by the defendants, that Johnson was not a servant of the defendants, and in their employ, within the meaning of the 8th section of the above act; but a verdict was found for the plaintiff; and upon a motion to enter a verdict for the defendants, Lord Cranworth said, "The statute must be construed with respect to this company as it would have been under the old system. The question then arises, are the company liable for this felonious act? They would undoubtedly be liable, unless the statute has limited their liability. The act says that carriers shall not be liable for goods of this description unless an insurance price be paid; but then is Johnson a book-keeper, porter, or other servant in the employ of the company, within the meaning of the 8th section? I think he is. The company defend themselves on the ground that the person who stole the goods was not their servant. It has been contended that no one is a servant of a carrier, within the meaning of that section, unless he be actually hired, retained, and paid by him. I do not, however, see how such a construction can possibly be put upon that section. The legislature not only contemplated that a carrier might himself carry the goods delivered to him, but that he might hand them over to another person to carry. If they were stolen by himself, he of course would not be protected; neither do I think he would if the person whom he had employed as a substitute were to steal them. I therefore think that Chaplin and Horne were servants of the company, within the meaning of the 8th section, and that every person was so, who was directly or indirectly employed by them to do what they had contracted to do by themselves, or by others under them." See also Hinton v. Dibbin, 2 Q. B. 646; Butt v. Great Western R. Co., 11 C. B. 140; G. W. R. Co. v. Rimell, 27 L. J. (C. P.) 201; Metcalf v. London, Brighton and S. C. R. Co., 27 L. J. (C. Money may be

The object of the above act is two-fold; first, that the carrier receiving the article may be apprised of its nature, in order that he may give it a proportionate degree of protection; and secondly, that as he incurs an additional danger and risk, he should have an increased compensation (c). In regard to the general effect of the act, it has been observed (d),—1st. That it relates solely to carriers by land: 2nd. That it extends to the particular articles enumerated, even although they do not come within the words of the preamble as being articles “of great value in small compass” (c); but that a parcel containing such articles is within the act only where, at the time of their being delivered to the carrier (e), their aggregate value exceeds 10*l.*: 3rd. That where the nature and value of the goods have been declared by the sender, the statute exempts the carrier from his common law responsibility as to such goods, only in the event of his affixing a public and conspicuous notice in his receiving office, notifying the extra charge for carrying such valuable articles (f); or where there is a special contract: 4th. That, although such notice be affixed, the carrier is not responsible for the loss of any goods of the description mentioned, unless the value and nature thereof be in the first instance declared by the sender, and that, whether the goods are delivered at the office of the carrier or at the sender’s house, or on the road or elsewhere, nor where such notice is affixed unless the increased rate of charge for carriage be paid to, or an agreement to pay it be accepted by the carrier. And on this branch of the statute it has been held, first, that to entitle a party to recover for the loss of, or for any injury to such articles, he must give express notice to the carrier of the value and nature thereof (g); and secondly, that, in cases within the act, if the value of the goods be not declared, and the vendor do not pay or engage to pay the increased charge, [if demanded (h),] the carrier is not liable for their loss, although it happens by the gross negligence of his servants (i). But if the carrier [do not demand any increased charge when informed of the value he did not steal the parcel which was the subject of the action, and the verdict was found for the plaintiff, a new trial was refused. Boyce v. Chapman, 2 Bing. N. C. 222; 1 Hodges, 338.

and nature of the goods (l), or refuse on demand to give a receipt for the goods and extra charge, this will deprive him of the protection of the act (m): 5th. That the statute does not protect the carrier from any loss arising from the felonious act of any servant in his employ (n); and as to this, it is held, first, that to render the carrier liable it is [necessary to give such evidence as would convict some one or more of the carrier's servants of felony (o);] and secondly, that where a common carrier enters into a sub-contract with other parties with respect to the carriage of goods which he has undertaken to carry, the servants employed by the latter are "servants" in the employ of the carrier within the true meaning of the statute (p): 6th. That as to all goods not specifically mentioned in the act, and as to goods of the description therein mentioned when the value thereof is not above 10*l.*, the carrier's common law liability remains; even although such notice be given, or any public notice or declaration be made or given by the carrier, with the intention of limiting his liability with reference thereto: 7th. That the act does not preclude the parties from entering into a special contract, as to the conveyance of goods of any description or value (q): 8th. It seems that if the loss or injury be occasioned by the personal neglect or misconduct of the coachman, guard, book-keeper or other servant of the carrier, in a case in which the carrier himself is not responsible, such coachman, &c. may be sued by the owner of the goods for the consequent damage (r). And lastly, the words of the statute being, that in the cases therein mentioned the carrier shall not be liable "for the loss of or injury to goods," unless their value be declared and an increased rate of charge paid or agreed to be paid for the carriage thereof; this does not protect the carrier from loss or damage occasioned to the owner of the goods by the delay of the former in forwarding them to their destination (s), or if he omit to forward the goods (t), or if he forward them by another conveyance than that agreed upon (u), or send them beyond their place of destination (x), or by an unusual route (y), or generally in any case where the damage complained of is occasioned by the carrier's misfeasance (z).

IV. The Rights and Liabilities of Railway Companies as Carriers of Goods.

With respect to the duties of carriers, it is laid down that if a carrier professes to carry all sorts of goods, it is his duty to receive and carry all goods offered for carriage. This is the result of his public employment as a carrier; and, according to the custom of the realm, if he will not carry goods for a reasonable compensation, he will be liable to an action, unless there is a reasonable ground for the refusal. But he is only bound to carry goods according to the profession which he has made to the public (b). Thus a railway company must carry goods beyond the limits of their own railway, and even to places out of the realm, if they profess to carry such goods (c). So, if a company profess to carry coals or other merchandize on their railway, they are required to carry the coals or merchandize of all persons who may bring them for carriage, provided there are carriages and other necessary conveniences to enable them to do so: but they are not obliged to supply a larger number of waggons than they are in the habit of using. The same rule is applicable to the case of passengers; for, at common law, a carrier of passengers could only be compelled to carry them if he had room in his carriage (d). In Johnson v. Midland R. Co. (e), Lord Wensleydale said:—

carry according to their public profession.*

Johnson v. Midland R. Co.

“A carrier may profess to carry light goods only, and then he cannot be compelled to carry heavy goods; or he may say that he will carry from Manchester to London, and not from the intermediate stations, and then he cannot be made to carry goods from those places; but as soon as he has publicly professed to carry in any particular manner, and so long as he does so, he is bound to carry the goods of any one, if he has room in his conveyance, and the price of the carriage be tendered when the goods are offered. Here, however, there has been no public profession on the part of the company, that they will carry coals from Melton Mowbray to Oakham. Nor, indeed, would the action lie in this case, even if there were such an implied contract with the public, because it does not appear that the company had conveniences for carrying coal from Melton Mowbray to Oakham. As to the proposition, that the liability arises from the statutes under which the defendants are empowered to act, and that, when they once become carriers, they are bound to carry all kinds of goods from and to every station on the line, it appears to me that that proposition is not made out. There might have been great ground for that proposition, if the acts had contained a prohibition to all other persons carrying on a like business on the line. But, on the contrary, the acts show that the public have a right to carry goods on a railway if they please. Practically, no doubt, that right has been found to be useless. We must, however, look, not to the practical effect, but to the meaning of the legislature; and I am of opinion, that, under this act, if the company become carriers, there is no obligation on them to take upon themselves the duties of carriers altogether, and on every part of their line, but they may confine their carrying to any part to which they choose to limit themselves, and they may afterwards relinquish the business if they please, though it is not necessary to determine that point now (f). I am of opinion that the 86th section of the Railway Clauses Act enables, but does not compel, the company to act as carriers."

Alderson, B., added:—

"Section 86 appears to me to be clearly permissive. It is admitted to be so to a certain extent: that it does not compel the company to become carriers; but it is contended, that, if they have once become carriers, it then imposes on them the obligation of carrying all goods from every part of the line to every other part. But this construction is inconsistent with section 89, which says 'that the company shall be liable only as common carriers.'"

The cases also show that if a carrier refuses to take charge of goods, because his coach is full (g), or because the goods are of a

(f) In Hare v. L. and N. W. R. Co., 30 L. J. (Ch.) 823; 2 Johns. & Hemm. 80, Wood, V. C., said, "I cannot have any doubt; I felt none before in Lancaster and Carlisle R. Co. v. N. W. R. Co., 2 K. & J. 293; 25 L. J. (Ch.) 223, that there is a power in any railway company to abstain from carrying at all, if it thinks fit. I quite agree, if it becomes a carrier, it must then carry for all; it cannot carry for some and refuse to carry for others; but I am quite at a loss to discover any indication of intention in any of the acts that they should necessarily become carriers, except for the conveyance of the mails and troops, which it was thought Parliament was justified in imposing upon them. There are two indications very plain to the contrary; first, which is of course the highest indication, it is a power which is conferred, and not a direction or mandate on the part of the government, that they shall be carriers on the line; secondly, in what is called the Cheap Passenger Traffic Act (7 & 8 Vict. c. 85, post, App. 18), and through all those series of acts which provide for cheap trains, the provision is always that so long as they shall carry on the railway they shall have those cheap trains, indicating that it was probable or possible that they might themselves not become carriers. I say 'probable' for this reason: I do not know whether any such arrangement actually exist, but I can easily conceive the proprietors of short lines of railway joining to other large lines making arrangements that they should not become carriers at all, by which the carrying should take place totally by those larger companies; the officers of the short lines not of course contravening the intention of the legislature by resigning the management of their line, but simply taking tolls under any such arrangement as they may think fit; and accordingly, whether with foresight or not, Parliament did contemplate that there might be other companies starting for using these lines, because in the Railways Clauses Act there is a clause (sect. 92), that the railway shall be free on the payment of tolls; and it was in contemplation, probably, that other companies or persons might be induced, although the difficulties which are incident to the thing have prevented such a course being taken, to become carriers upon the general line of railway."

(g) Lovett v. Hobbs, 2 Show. 428. In Ex parte Robins, 7 Dowl. 566, a mandamus was refused to compel a railway company to carry the goods of a particular carrier, on the ground that the general law of the land might be enforced by action.

nature, which will at the time expose them to extraordinary danger (h), or to a popular rage (i), or because they are brought at an unseasonable time (h); these will furnish reasonable grounds for his refusal, and will, if true, be a sufficient legal defence to a suit for the non-carriage of the goods (l).

The Rights and Liabilities of the Company as Carriers of Goods.

But the provisions of sect. 2 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, already noticed (m), will probably qualify the doctrine laid down in some of the cases we have been considering.

Another duty of carriers is, to take the utmost care of goods from the moment of receiving them (n); to carry them safely to the proper place of destination; and to make a right delivery of them there, according to the usage of trade, or the course of business (o). A carrier is responsible for loss by accidental fire, unless he is protected from such liability by a special contract (p). And a carrier is also required to obey the directions of the owner of the goods during their transit, and at any period of the transit he may have them back, unless the subsequent directions are unreasonable, as where goods have been put into a place from which they could not be removed without the greatest inconvenience, or the like (q).

Carriers bound to carry safely.

(h) By 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 105, ante, 501, post, App. 93, railway companies cannot be required to carry upon the railway, — aquafortis, oil of vitriol, gunpowder, lucifer-matches, or any other goods which, in the judgment of the company, may be of a dangerous nature; and parties sending such goods without giving notice to the company are liable to be fined. The company may also refuse to take any parcel they may suspect, or require it to be opened. But they have no general right, in every case and under all circumstances, to require to be informed of the contents of packages tendered to be carried. Crouch v. L. and N. W. R. Co., 23 L. J. (C. (n) It is sufficient to prove a delivery either to an agent of the defendant, at the usual place of receipt, or to an agent who had authority to receive them. Thus, in an action against a carrier for the loss of a parcel, where the defendant pleaded that it was not delivered to him to be carried, it was held to be sufficient to show that it was delivered to a person and at a house where parcels were in the habit of being left for the carrier, and that it was immaterial whether this person was paid any money or not. Burrell v. North, 2 Car. & Kir. 680, per Erle, J.

The Rights and Liabilities of the Company as Carriers of Goods.

May set up title of real owner.

Common carriers who are bound to receive goods and can make no inquiry as to the ownership, are not estopped from setting up the title of the real owner and delivering them to him; and as they would be protected by the law against him, if they delivered the goods in pursuance of their employment without notice of his claim; so they are equally protected against a pseudo owner from whom they receive the goods, in the event of the real owner claiming them, and their being given up to him (r).

If the consignee refuse to receive the goods, the carrier is not bound to give notice to the consignor. He must do what is reasonable under the circumstances, and what is reasonable is a question for a jury (s).

Carriers liable beyond their own line.

It has been frequently decided that carriers, who have received goods to be taken to a point beyond that to which their own means of conveyance extends, are liable, as carriers, for losses beyond that point (t). And the same rule applies if an English railway company ants, to be taken to London for hire, and by the practice of the defendants, goods so delivered for London were conveyed by their line to Birmingham, and thence by the L. and N. W. R., and it appeared that before the goods arrived in London the plaintiff delivered to a clerk, at the Euston Station of the L. and N. W. R., a written order, directing that they should be forwarded to Ratcliffe Highway, but the order was not complied with, and the goods were taken to the Melbourne and carried to Australia and lost, it was decided that the plaintiff was entitled to countermand the direction originally given; that the clerk at the Euston Station was an agent of the defendants, having authority to receive the countermand; and that the defendants were therefore liable for the loss occasioned by their non-compliance with the countermand. *Scotthorn v. R. Co., 8 M. & W. 421. In that case Lord Cranworth said, "I think the construction we are putting on the agreement is not only consistent with law, but is the only one consistent with common sense and the convenience of mankind. What I told the jury was only this, that if a party brings a parcel to a railway station—which, in this respect, is just the same as a coach office, knowing at the time that the company only carry to a particular place, and if the railway company receive and book it to another place to which it is directed, prima facie, they undertake to carry it to that other place. That was my view at the trial, and nothing has occurred to alter my opinion. As to the case which has been put, of a passenger injured on the line of railway beyond that where he was originally booked, I suppose it is put as a reductio ad absurdum; but I do not see the absurdity. If I book my place at Euston Square, and pay to be carried to York, and am injured by the negligence of somebody between Euston Square and York, I do not know why I am not to have my remedy against the party who so contracted to carry me to York. But at all events, in the case of a parcel, any other construction would open the door to incalculable inconveniences. You book a parcel, and on its being lost, you are told that the carrier is responsible only for one portion of the line of road. What would be the answer of the owner of the goods?—'I know that I booked the parcel at the Golden Cross for Liverpool, and my contract with the carrier was to take it to Liverpool.' All convenience is one way, and there is no authority the other way." Subsequent cases have fully supported the rule thus clearly laid down. See Watson v. Ambergate R. Co., 15 Jur. 448; Scotthorn v. South Staffordshire profess to carry goods beyond the limits of their railway to Scotland, and they are to be treated as common carriers throughout the whole journey (u). The same principle has been applied to passengers (x). But this liability would not apply where the company had by one of the conditions of their contract of carriage stipulated for an exemption from it (y).

The Rights and Liabilities of the Company as Carriers of Goods.

Another point is, at what time the carrier is bound to make a delivery of the goods? The general answer is, that he is bound to deliver the goods within a reasonable time (z), under ordinary circumstances, but he is not bound to use extraordinary efforts, or incur extraordinary expense in order to surmount obstructions caused by the act of God. If a snowstorm occurs which makes it impossible to carry the goods, except by extraordinary efforts involving additional expense, a carrier is not bound to use such means and to incur such expense (a). If, however, the party sending the goods stipulate that the carrier shall forward them the same evening, a special contract is created, and the carrier may be sued for a breach of it (b).

A carrier is, in all cases, entitled at common law to demand the price or hire of carriage, before he receives the goods; and, if it is not paid, he may refuse to take charge of them. But it is not necessary, in order to support an action for refusing to carry, that the satisfaction should have been tendered, in the strict sense of that term as applied to antecedent debts. It is sufficient, if the consignor was ready and willing to deal for ready money, and notifies that readiness and willingness to the carrier; the money is not required to be paid down until the carrier receives the goods which he is bound to carry (c). If the price of carriage is not paid before the goods are received, the carrier cannot sue for such price till they are delivered (d).

Damages for non-delivery.

With regard to the damages to which a carrier is liable for non-delivery of goods, the following rule was laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale (e): Where two parties have made a contract which one of them has broken, the damages which the other party ought to receive in respect of such breach of contract, should be such as may fairly and reasonably be considered either arising naturally, i. e., according to the usual course of things, from such breach of contract itself, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties at the time they made the contract, as the probable result of the breach of it. Now, if the special circumstances under which the contract was actually made were communicated by the plaintiffs to the defendants, and thus known to both parties, the damages resulting from the breach of such a contract which they would reasonably contemplate, would be the amount of injury which would ordinarily follow from a breach of contract under these special circumstances so known and communicated. But, on the other hand, if these special circumstances were wholly unknown to the party breaking the contract, he at the most could only be supposed to have had in his contemplation the amount of injury which would arise generally and in the great multitude of cases, not affected by any special circumstances, from such a breach of contract. For had the special circumstances been known, the parties might have specially provided for the breach of contract by special terms as to the damages in that case; and of this advantage it would be very unjust to deprive them. Now the above principles are those by which we think the jury ought to be guided in estimating the damages arising out of any breach of contract.

Loss of profit.

Upon this principle, where a miller sent a broken iron shaft to a carrier to be conveyed by him to a consignee as a pattern for a new shaft, and the carrier's clerk was told that the mill was stopped, and the shaft must be delivered immediately, and that a special entry, if necessary, must be made to hasten its delivery; but the delivery was nevertheless delayed an unreasonable time, in consequence of which the mill was stopped, and the miller incurred a loss of profits; it was held that such loss could not be recovered against the carrier, who had no notice that the profits of the mill would be stopped by unreasonable delay in delivering the shaft, and the loss could not be considered such a consequence of the breach of contract as could have been fairly and reasonably contemplated by both parties when they made the contract (f).

(e) 9 Exch. 341.

(f) Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 341. In Simons v. Patchett, 26 L. J. (Q. B.) 197, Crompton, J., remarked on Hadley v. Baxendale:—"The curious part of that case is, that there was a most distinct notification to the carrier of the consequences that would follow the non-delivery of the shaft, and yet the court held that those consequences could not be taken into consideration." But the rule above laid down has always been followed. See Portman v. Middleton, 27 L. J. (C. P.) 231; Smeed v. Foord, 28 L. J. (Q. B.) 178; Hales v. L. and N. W. R. Co., 32 L. J. (Q. B.) 292.

And so where a railway company refused to carry at the ordinary rate packed parcels for a carrier, whereby he was obliged to send them by a more circuitous route at a greater expense, it was held that he was not entitled to recover damages for an alleged loss of business (g).

Crouch v. Great Northern R. Co.
Loss of business.

So in an action for delay in delivering skins for making gloves, Keating, J., held that the plaintiff, although entitled to recover the deterioration in the value of the skins, could not recover the loss in wages paid to workmen kept idle in consequence of their non-arrival, and his ruling was upheld by the Court of Queen's Bench (h).

Le Peintur v. South-Eastern R. Co.
Loss of wages.

So, again, where the plaintiffs caused to be delivered bales of cotton to a railway company to be carried from Liverpool to Oldham, and instead of being delivered the following morning, which was the usual time, the cotton was not delivered for four days. The plaintiffs enquired for it at the Oldham station, both before and after the actual delivery of it to the defendants, and told the defendants' manager that the plaintiffs' mill was at a standstill on account of the non-delivery of the cotton, and that they would look to the company for compensation for the loss sustained; but the fact of the mill being at a standstill was not communicated to the defendants or their agents at Liverpool at the time the cotton was delivered to them to be carried; and in consequence of the delay a new mill of the plaintiffs was prevented working for two days and a half, and workpeople kept idle to whom plaintiffs had to pay 7*l.* wages, and the plaintiffs claimed 7*l.* 10*s.* for the profits they would have made by working their mill for the time in question; it was held by the Court of Exchequer that neither wages nor loss of profit could be recovered (i).

It has, however, been held in an action by a cap manufacturer against a railway company for damages for loss sustained by delay in delivery of cloth, by which the plaintiff lost the season for making it into caps, and so disposing of it, that although the plaintiff could not recover his loss of profits, yet the jury might take into consideration the deterioration in the marketable value of the cloth, by reason of the season having passed for making caps which the plaintiff might then have sold (k).

Wilson v. Lancashire and Yorkshire R. Co.
Deterioration of goods, loss of season.

The plaintiff sent hops in bags from Kent to London by the defendants' railway, for the purpose of delivery to the vendee, a hop dealer. The hops were detained by the defendants several days, and were damaged by water, and the vendee refused to accept them. The plaintiff dried the hops, but when fit for sale the price had fallen;

moreover the stained part of the hops deteriorated the market value of the whole, although for brewing purposes the bulk was unaffected. The plaintiff sued the company, and it was held that he was entitled to recover the difference between the market value (l) of the whole on the day the hops ought to have been brought to market, and the day on which they were afterwards brought to market, and was not confined to the value of the parts actually damaged, although the defendants had no notice that the hops were sent for sale and not for use; and it was also held that there was no difference between a delay occasioned by the detention of the hops in the hands of the carrier, and the delay necessary for restoring them to a marketable state when delivered by the carrier in a damaged condition (m).

Carriers have special property in goods.

As to the general rights of carriers, it is to be observed, that, in virtue of the delivery of the goods, they acquire a special property in them, and may maintain an action against any person who takes the goods out of their possession, or does any injury to them (n). This right arises from their general interest in conveying the goods, and their responsibility for any loss or injury to them during their transit.

Remedies for tolls.

We have already seen that a railway company, in addition to the remedies given by the common law, have several special powers reserved to them, to entitle them to ascertain and recover the amount of tolls due to them. Thus, the tolls must be paid as the company may direct (o). On default of payment of tolls a right of general lien is given, in addition to the remedy by an action at law (p). An account in writing of the lading of carriages must be given on pain of a penalty (q). Disputes concerning the amount of tolls may be settled by a justice (r). Lastly, in case of difference between the servants of the company and the owner, or person having charge of any carriage passing on the railway, or of any goods conveyed by such carriage, respecting the quantity or nature of such goods, the servants of the company may examine the goods (s).

Termination of risk.

As to the termination of the carrier's risk, it may be observed, that (l) In Rice v. Baxendale, 30 L. J. (Exch.) 371; 7 H. & N. 96, the consignee was held entitled to recover the value of goods at the place to which they were consigned, as distinguished from the place at which they were delivered to the carrier.

the material consideration is, whether the owner of the goods has taken any exclusive possession of them, or has terminated the custody of the carrier by any act or direction which does not flow from the duty of a carrier. So long as the carrier retains the possession of the goods, or is to perform any further duty, either by custom or contract, as carrier, he is responsible for their safety. But when the transit is ended, and the delivery is either completed or waived by the owner, the responsibility of the carrier ceases (t).

The Rights and Liabilities of the Company as Carriers of Goods.

It may conveniently be noticed in this place, that where a railway company allowed a consignee of heavy goods the gratuitous use of a crane to put them on his truck, and in doing so the crane broke and a volunteer assisting was killed, it was held that the company were not responsible to his representatives (u).

Loan of crane to consignee.

V. The Rights and Liabilities of Railway Companies as Carriers of Passengers and their Luggage.

It is now proposed to consider the liabilities of carriers in respect of passengers: first, as to their luggage; and secondly, as to their persons.

First, as to their luggage. Passengers by railways are accustomed, as of right, to take a certain specified quantity of luggage, for which no charge in addition to the fare is made. The quantity of luggage thus allowed is in some of the early special acts particularly specified; and in all the special acts passed during and subsequent to the session 1845 the following clause as to passengers' luggage was inserted, viz., that every passenger travelling upon the railway might take with him his ordinary luggage, not exceeding a weight particularly specified, without any charge being made for the carriage thereof. The 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85, s. 6, as we have seen (x), also contains a provision obliging all railway companies to permit third-class passengers to take a limited quantity of luggage (y).

As to passengers' luggage.

(y) The weight of luggage allowed to passengers in the special acts passed 8 & 9 Vict. varies, in the case of first-class passengers from 100 lbs. to 150 lbs.; in the case of second-class passengers, from 60 lbs. to 100 lbs.; and in the case of third-class passengers, from 40 lbs. to 100 lbs. In six instances, the luggage allowed to passengers is limited in dimensions as well as in weight; and in four acts it is provided, that passengers' luggage shall be conveyed at the risk of the company, upon the payment of a sum not exceeding two-pence for each parcel. Bigg's Collection of Special Acts, 1854 (Introd. xxviii.) In some of the early Special Railway Acts, the company are exempted from liability in respect of certain descriptions of passengers' luggage. See Elwell v. Grand Junction R. Co., 5 M. & W. 669. If a passenger by Excursion Train, "no luggage allowed," takes luggage, he must pay for the carriage of it, or the company may detain it for the amount. Rumsey v. North Eastern R. Co., 32 L. J. (C. P.) 244; 8 L. T. (N. S.) 666; 14 C. B. (N. S.) 641. And the company are not liable for the loss of luggage in an Excursion Train, "luggage under 60 lbs. free, at passenger's own risk." Stewart v. L. and N. W. R. Co., 33 L. J. (Exch.) 199.

The Rights and Liabilities of the Company as Carriers of Passengers.

Passengers' luggage.

The doctrine seems now to be firmly established (z), that the responsibility of carriers of passengers with their luggage stands, as to the luggage, upon the ordinary footing of common carriers (a). The observations already made with reference to the liabilities of common carriers, in respect of goods carried by them, are therefore applicable in considering the extent of the liability of railway companies for the loss or injury of the luggage of passengers carried on the railway. If, therefore, the luggage of a passenger be lost, the company are liable, and it is immaterial whether there be negligence or not, and it makes no difference whether the luggage be placed in the carriage in which the passenger is seated, or in some other part of the train (b).

Richards v. London, Brighton and South Coast R. Co.

Therefore, where the plaintiff's wife and a female servant took places for London in a first-class carriage on the defendants' railway, at W. station, bringing with them a large quantity of luggage, which was weighed and the excess paid for, and on arriving at London

(z) In Story on Bailments, 324, it is said, "It has been a matter of some controversy, in what character the proprietors of stage-coaches and steam-boats, and rail-cars, are to be regarded. The more important question has been in regard to their liability for the baggage of passengers, whether it is that of common carriers, or only that of private persons engaging ordinarily for hire, that is, for due and reasonable skill and diligence in the undertaking. The general tendency of the authorities, however, has at all times been to the point, that, as to the baggage of the passengers, the proprietors are common carriers. And the doctrine seems now firmly established, both in England and America, that the responsibility of coach proprietors carrying passengers with their baggage, stands, as to their baggage, upon the ordinary footing of common carriers. Mr. Bell has deduced this as the true modern doctrine on the subject." See Bennet v. Peninsular Steam Boat Co., 6 C. B. 782; 6 D. & L. 387. Pollock, C. B., however, has expressed an opinion, that the carrier in respect of such baggage undertakes no responsibility beyond that which he undertakes with respect to the passenger himself. Stewart v. L. and N. W. R. Co., 33 L. J. (Exch.) 199.

gage, and a passenger brings merchandise, to be used in his way of business, packed as luggage, the company are not liable for the loss of the package. In Great Northern R. Co. v. Shepherd, 21 L. J. (Exch.) 114; 8 Exch. 30, Lord Wensleydale laid down the rule on this point as follows:—"There being no special contract, the defendants were only bound to carry the plaintiff and his luggage, and under that term may be comprised his clothing, and everything required for his personal convenience, and perhaps even a small present, or a book might also be included in that term; but they were certainly not bound to carry merchandise and materials intended for trade, and to be sold at a profit. Had the company, with full notice of what the passenger was carrying, chosen to treat it as luggage, they would have been responsible for the loss; but their duty as common carriers was only to carry luggage, and not merchandise or articles wholly disconnected with personal luggage. If they had had notice they might have refused to carry it without an additional payment, but they had no opportunity of acquiring this knowledge in this case. Whether this was done with any fraudulent intention it is not material to inquire, for if without any fraud the passenger has so conducted himself that the company were not apprized of the nature of what he was carrying, it is the same in effect as if a fraud had been intended." See also Cahill v. L. and N. W. R. Co., 10 C. B. (N. S.) 154; 30 L. J. (C. P.) 289; 31 L. J. (C. P.) 271; Keys v. Belfast, &c. R. Co., 8 Ir. C. L. R. 167; 9 H. L. C. 556; 8 Jur. (N. S.) 367. Semble, that if each passenger is allowed 56 lbs. weight of luggage, a man and his wife may carry 112 lbs. between them, although the wife's personal luggage is only 3 lbs. weight. G. N. R. Co. v. Shepherd, ubi supra.

Bridge Station the lady, an invalid, was assisted to a hackney coach, into and upon which the luggage was placed by servants of the company, who, upon the maid attempting to remove the small articles from the railway carriage to the coach, desired her not to trouble herself as they would see to the luggage; but upon reaching the plaintiff's residence it was discovered for the first time that part of the luggage, viz., a dressing-case, containing trinkets and jewellery, which had been placed under the seat of the railway carriage, was missing, and was not afterwards found; it was held that the company were liable, although it was contended that the goods were duly carried, inasmuch as they were not delivered (c).

The Rights and Liabilities of the Company as Carriers of Passengers.

Passengers' luggage.

Again, where a passenger took with him into the railway carriage a carpet bag containing money, and kept it in his own possession till the arrival of the train in London, and on alighting from the carriage with the bag in his hand, permitted a porter of the company to take it from him to secure a cab, and the porter having found a cab (within the station) placed the bag on the footboard and returned for other luggage of the plaintiff, when the cab disappeared and the bag and money were lost, it was held that this was a loss by the negligence of the company, for which they were responsible (d).

Butcher v. London and South-Western R. Co.

By a special act for making a railway, every passenger was to be allowed to take with him, without extra charge, his articles of clothing not exceeding a certain weight, and the company were not to be liable for the safe carriage of any articles belonging to passengers except such articles of clothing. The company under the powers of their act made regulations, by one of which passengers were required to see their luggage marked with the company's labels, and the company stated that they would not be responsible for the loss or detention of any article of luggage not so marked and properly addressed; and by another regulation, all unclaimed property found on the company's premises was to be deposited in the lost property office, and to be restored to the owner on payment of 6d. for each article. The plaintiff, a passenger, required the company's porter to label and take in the luggage van a package, consisting only of wearing apparel wrapped in a shawl, properly packed and addressed, and within the allowed weight. The porter refused, as the company had made a rule not to label shawls, but offered to put it in the carriage with the plaintiff, where it was to be under his charge. This the plaintiff objected to unless it was to be at the company's risk, but did not prevent the company putting it there or in any other part of the train. The package was left behind in consequence of such refusal to label and carry it with the rest of the luggage, and was taken by a porter to the lost property office, and refused to be restored to the plaintiff except on payment of 6*d.* It was held that this was a wrongful act, for which the company were responsible, as they were not justified in refusing to carry the package with the responsibility of carriers (e).

But where a passenger by the Midland Railway from Gloucester to Bristol, on arriving at Bristol terminus told a porter that he wished to proceed by the Bristol and Exeter Railway (whose station closely adjoined that of the Midland) to Torquay, and the porter thereupon placed his portmanteau on a truck with other luggage, entered the Bristol and Exeter station with the luggage, passed down an incline from the arrival platform, crossed the rails, ascended an incline to the departure platform of the Bristol and Exeter Railway, and there was no evidence that the portmanteau was ever seen afterwards, but it never reached Torquay; it was held, that there was no evidence against the Midland R. Co. of a breach of their contract to deliver, either to the passenger or at the departure platform of the Bristol and Exeter Railway (f).

And it would seem that the company would not be liable for the loss of a purse, coat in use, or other like article under the personal control and in the custody of the passenger himself (g).

Stallard v. Great Western R. Co.

Where a passenger, having travelled up to London by the defendants' railway, left a box at the cloak room at the station, paid 2*d.* and received a ticket, on which was a condition that the defendants would not deliver up luggage deposited without the production of the ticket, and on the following day, Sunday, called with the ticket, but there was no one in attendance at the cloak room, and after waiting about some time went to another part of the station, found an attendant and so obtained his box, but was delayed forty minutes, whereby he missed another train by another railway by which he had intended to travel (the cloak room on week days was open all day, but on Sunday only a few minutes before and after trains arrived, of which however the plaintiff was not aware), it was held, in an action brought by the passenger against the railway company for damages caused by this delay, that the ticket being silent on the subject the defendants' contract was to redeliver the box within a reasonable time after reasonable demand, and that whether or not there had been unreasonable delay under the circumstances was a question for the jury and ought to be left to them (h).
